Brussels, 20 September 2000 (21.09)
(OR. de)*SN 4291/00*Letter from Roman Herzog, former President of the Federal Republic of Germany, to the Members of the Convention

Given the intensive and comprehensive discussions within the Convention and its four constituent Working Groups, I have the impression that we should be able to conclude our proceedings on the draft Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union at the forthcoming meeting on 25 and 26 September. We will thereby be able to meet the wish expressed by the President of the European Council of receiving the draft in time for the European Council meeting in Biarritz.

I therefore suggest the following procedure for the forthcoming meeting:

The four Working Groups should meet from 14.30 to 18.00 on 25 September to express their opinions on Charte 4470/00 CONVENT 47. Afterwards the Praesidium will discuss in my absence the amendments to CONVENT 47 which it will recommend to the Chairman of the Convention.

The Members of the Convention will subsequently have the opportunity to express their opinions on those recommendations at the plenary session from 11.00 to 17.00 on 26 September.

As Chairman of the Convention, in accordance with the conclusions of the Tampere European Council, I therefore intend to forward to the President of the European Council on 2 October the version of the draft Charter of Fundamental Rights which, in my opinion, in consultation with the Vice-Chairs, is acceptable to all sides.

A formal concluding meeting of the Convention is scheduled from 11.00 to 12.30 on 2 October.

I hope you will all be able to attend that meeting.

DOCUMENT DE TRAVAIL

sur l'élaboration d'une charte des droits fondamentaux de l'Union européenne

Commission des affaires constitutionnelles

Rapporteur: Andrew Duff et Johannes Voggenhuber

VERS UNE CHARTE DES DROITS FONDAMENTAUX

1. Le Conseil européen de Cologne a décidé que les "droits fondamentaux applicables à l'échelle de l'Union devaient être ancrés dans une charte afin d'en accroître, par là même, la visibilité". Un projet de charte des droits fondamentaux doit être soumis d'ici la fin de l'an 2000. Le Parlement européen s'est félicité de cette décision, que le Conseil de Tampere a confirmée à une large majorité. Nous ne devons toutefois avoir aucun doute sur la complexité de la tâche qui nous attend, ni sur l'importance de ses implications pour l'avenir de l'Union européenne.

2. Le présent document de travail envisage certains des points qui devront être abordés par la délégation du Parlement européen auprès de l'enceinte chargée d'élaborer le projet de charte. Si certaines des questions évoquées ici ne pourront être résolues que par l'enceinte dans son ensemble, la délégation du Parlement n'en devra pas moins, en tout état de cause, arrêter sans tarder ses positions en la matière.

3. La première réunion de l'enceinte doit se réunir à Bruxelles le 17 décembre. À l'issue de cette réunion, les corapporteurs de la commission des affaires constitutionnelles seront chargés d'élaborer un premier rapport, qui sera mis aux voix lors de la période de session de mars et qui aura pour objectif de conférer un mandat à la délégation du Parlement européen.

4. Il apparaît d'ores et déjà clairement que d'éventuelles divergences pourraient entraver les travaux de l'enceinte, concernant les cinq points suivants:

- i) la procédure décisionnelle,
- ii) le caractère juridique de la charte,
- iii) son champ d'application,
- iv) son contenu,
- v) les relations avec la CIG.

I. La procédure décisionnelle

5. Le Parlement européen reconnaît que les critiques qu'il a de bonne heure formulées sur la procédure envisagée ont été prises en considération par le Conseil européen. Nous nous félicitons de la décision visant à garantir une représentation paritaire du Conseil européen et du Parlement, l'élection de son président par l'enceinte et l'accès du public aux réunions et à la documentation.

6. Nous insistons sur la nécessité d'instaurer une coopération aussi étroite que possible entre l'enceinte et la CIG, afin que la charte puisse, au stade final, être dûment intégrée au traité.

7. Il convient de prévoir les voies et moyens nécessaires pour associer les pays candidats aux travaux de l'enceinte.

8. Les modalités de fonctionnement de l'enceinte elle-même soulèvent certaines ambiguïtés. Le Conseil européen a proposé que le projet final soit "adopté par toutes les parties". Nous en déduisons donc que ce ne sont pas seulement les 16 députés au Parlement qui devront se prononcer en ce sens (au besoin, par un vote à la majorité qualifiée), mais que l'ensemble du Parlement devra également donner son avis conforme.

9. Les 62 membres de l'enceinte devront faire preuve d'une certaine flexibilité afin que, non seulement les questions importantes soient dûment prises en considération, mais aussi que l'enceinte fasse montre d'une certaine détermination. Il est probable que les délégations les plus cohérentes seront les plus influentes, et nous souhaitons voir la délégation composée des 16 membres du Parlement européen parvenir à un solide consensus. M. Iñigo Mendez de Vigo a été élu président de cette délégation et vice-président de l'enceinte, lors de la première réunion du 24 novembre. D'autres postes, parmi lesquels ceux de vice-présidents et de rapporteurs doivent encore être pourvus.

Propositions des rapporteurs sur la procédure

10. Les corapporteurs soumettront au mois de janvier un projet de premier rapport qui aura pour objectif de mandater la délégation du Parlement européen auprès de l'enceinte.

11. Nous proposons que le terme d'"enceinte" soit dorénavant remplacé par celui de "convention".

12. En ce qui concerne les travaux de la convention, nous proposons que les décisions portant sur le contenu soient adoptées sur la base d'une voix par membre, mais que les décisions sur la procédure soient prises moyennant un accord entre les quatre parties (Parlement européen, Conseil européen, Commission européenne, membres des parlements nationaux).

13. L'élaboration d'un projet de charte des droits fondamentaux étant, par excellence, une tâche parlementaire, nous proposons que le président de la convention soit un parlementaire.

14. La délégation du Parlement à la convention devra envisager l'éventualité de proposer l'un de ses membres à la présidence de la convention.

15. Nous proposons l'organisation, dans les plus brefs délais, d'une réunion d'experts qui seront chargés de conseiller le Parlement.

16. Nous demandons, en outre, l'organisation d'une audition publique de représentants de la société civile. Cette audition et cette réunion devront avoir eu lieu avant les consultations officielles envisagées par le Conseil européen de Tampere.

17. Nous proposons que la Conférence européenne fasse office de plate-forme de consultation des pays candidats afin de comparer leurs régimes respectifs et celui de l'UE au chapitre des droits fondamentaux.

18. Nous devons encourager une collaboration aussi étroite que possible avec le Conseil de l'Europe, pour qui la charte devrait offrir une occasion unique de combler les lacunes constatées dans le régime actuel des droits fondamentaux.

II. Caractère juridique

19. Bien que la plupart des dispositions de la charte doivent être arrêtées lors des négociations relatives à sa rédaction, la procédure ne pourra progresser de façon substantielle aussi longtemps que la question - fondamentale - de son caractère juridique n'aura pas été réglée. Les différentes options seraient classées par ordre d'importance croissante les suivantes :

A. Une charte qui ne serait qu'une simple "proclamation" approuvée par toutes les parties afin de sensibiliser l'opinion publique sur le "visage humain" de l'Union européenne.

- B. Une charte qui s'efforcerait de rendre compte de la situation actuelle en matière de droits fondamentaux et d'informer les institutions européennes des obligations qui leur sont dévolues pour les respecter. Un tel document pourrait être annexé au traité sur l'Union européenne à titre de déclaration.
- C. Une charte qui se proposerait de définir le concept de citoyenneté européenne en élargissant la définition des droits qui en découlent, non seulement pour les institutions de l'UE et ses agences, mais aussi pour les gouvernements des États membres (y inclus les autorités locales et régionales) quant à la mise en œuvre de la législation et des politiques de l'Union. Ce type de charte pourrait être joint en annexe au traité en tant que protocole, ce qui contraindrait à notifier ses dispositions à la Cour de justice des Communautés européennes (CCJCE) et aux juridictions nationales.
- D. Une charte dont les dispositions seraient immédiatement impératives pour toutes les institutions et agences de l'UE, y inclus les États membres, au chapitre de la législation et des politiques communautaires (questions relevant des deuxième et troisième piliers comprises). Cette charte serait consacrée par le traité lui-même (et dans sa partie constitutionnelle, à supposer que les traités soient réformés conformément aux propositions du Parlement et de la Commission). Son application relèverait de la compétence des tribunaux nationaux et, en dernier ressort, de la CJCE, auxquels les citoyens auraient directement accès.

20. Les options A et B ne contribueraient guère à remédier à la situation peu satisfaisante qui règne actuellement, et qui se caractérise par le fait que les institutions ne sont pas directement assujetties à un éventail de droits fondamentaux spécifiques. Les options C et D auraient des incidences concrètes et, nous en sommes persuadés, bénéfiques sur les relations entre les institutions de l'UE et les citoyens.

21. Il convient d'observer que, après le Conseil de Tampere, le Parlement a indiqué qu'il serait souhaitable que la charte ait valeur contraignante pour les instances communautaires relevant de la législation de l'UE et ayant un impact direct sur les citoyens de l'Union. Dans sa récente résolution (Dimitrakopoulos/Leinen) sur la CIG, le Parlement a indiqué que la charte fait "partie intégrante" d'un "processus constitutionnel qui consolidera les droits des États membres et la citoyenneté de l'Union européenne". Il a également évoqué la nécessité pour la CIG de "... renforcer les procédures, en vue d'améliorer notamment l'accès des citoyens à la CJCE".

Propositions des rapporteurs sur le caractère juridique

22. Nous proposons donc que la convention décide d'emblée de rendre la charte obligatoire, et d'inviter la CIG à habiliter la Cour de justice des Communautés européennes à définir une jurisprudence dans ce domaine sur la base des demandes soumises individuellement par des citoyens de l'Union.

23. Nous proposons que le Parlement précise d'emblée que son avis conforme à la charte dépendra dans une très large mesure du caractère obligatoire de celle-ci et de l'accès des citoyens à la Cour de justice.

III. Champ d'application

24. Les droits fondamentaux sont indissolubles. La charte étant proposée à l'échelle de l'Union européenne, nous en déduisons donc qu'elle couvrira également les secteurs de la politique étrangère et de sécurité commune et la coopération en matière criminelle et juridique, y compris la mise en œuvre de l'accord de Schengen et les agences communautaires comme Europol. Ces secteurs relevant, par nature, de la compétence de plusieurs gouvernements, ils sont particulièrement exposés aux controverses touchant aux libertés civiles.

25. La question de la subsidiarité se posera avec une acuité particulière lorsqu'il s'agira de définir le champ d'application de la charte. Cette dernière n'est pas censée se substituer aux régimes nationaux en vigueur au chapitre des libertés civiles, mais les compléter au contraire, en ne portant que sur les actes adoptés par les institutions communautaires elles-mêmes et ceux adoptés par les gouvernements des États membres pour se conformer aux décisions de l'UE. La mesure dans laquelle la charte pourrait, le cas échéant, empiéter sur les préférences culturelles nationales – et la jurisprudence – demeure toutefois à déterminer.

26. Le Parlement doit admettre que l'intégration européenne n'a pas cessé d'apparaître comme un processus controversé, y compris dans les États membres où l'adhésion à l'UE n'est plus sérieusement contestée. En Allemagne, par exemple, une série d'arrêts de la Cour constitutionnelle ont ainsi remis en cause la légitimité de l'Union. La question des droits pose indirectement celle de la légitimité, et il ne fait aucun doute que l'élaboration d'une charte européenne provoquera des réactions hostiles dans certains milieux politiques.

27. Aux yeux des rapporteurs, il ne serait toutefois guère rationnel de restreindre le champ d'application de la charte en se bornant aux domaines (de fait, très peu nombreux) relevant de la compétence exclusive de l'UE. Si l'on veut que la charte ait un sens, elle doit nécessairement concerner les questions sociales, économiques et culturelles pour lesquelles l'UE dispose de compétences substantielles mais partagées avec les gouvernements des États membres, ainsi que les questions relatives à la sécurité.

28. Le champ d'application de la charte aux particuliers n'est pas non plus sans soulever certaines interrogations. Il est clair qu'elle aura un impact pour les citoyens de l'Union européenne (c'est-à-dire les ressortissants des États membres). Mais s'efforcera-t-on également d'étendre son champ d'application à certains ressortissants de pays tiers qui se trouvent sur le territoire de l'Union? Et, dans l'affirmative, lesquels : les résidents permanents, les travailleurs migrants, les touristes, les immigrants clandestins?

29. Cette charte aura également d'importantes implications internationales dans la mesure où elle est appelée à s'intéresser aux activités des sociétés étrangères opérant sur le territoire de l'Union. Il n'est pas non plus exclu qu'elle ait des incidences sur les activités d'entreprises implantées dans l'UE, y compris les firmes étrangères, opérant dans d'autres pays du monde.

Propositions des rapporteurs sur la mise en œuvre

30. Nous devons, sans tarder, tirer au clair les intentions du Conseil européen au regard des deuxième et troisième piliers, et faire pression pour que ceux-ci soient également couverts par la charte. Obtenir satisfaction sur ce point devrait constituer la seconde condition indispensable pour que le Parlement donne son avis conforme au projet final.

31. La délégation du Parlement devrait également insister pour que le champ d'application de la charte soit, dans la plus large mesure possible, étendu aux citoyens à l'intérieur des frontières de l'UE même si, conformément au statut, différentes catégories de droits et d'obligations peuvent être envisagées. Les rapporteurs estiment que la charte devrait, en l'occurrence, comporter les trois chapitres suivantes:

- * les droits de l'homme consacrés par le droit international et qui sont d'application universelle;
- * les droits fondamentaux applicables à l'espace judiciaire européen;
- * les droits civils applicables aux seuls citoyens de l'Union européenne.

32. Nous devons être pleinement informés des implications de la charte sur le fonctionnement du marché intérieur et la politique commerciale de l'Union.

IV. Contenu

33. Le Parlement européen a souligné, dans la première résolution qu'il a adoptée sur la charte, en septembre 1999, que celle-ci devait témoigner d'une approche ouverte et novatrice, et ne pas apparaître d'emblée comme un simple descriptif des dispositions légales en vigueur.

34. La charte devra néanmoins faire référence au corpus actuel des droits en vigueur dans l'UE et dans ses États membres. Outre les traités communautaires et l'accord de Schengen, on compte près de 14 conventions signées par un ou tous les États membres pendant la période de l'après-guerre. Ces conventions émanent des Nations unies, du Conseil de l'Europe, de l'Organisation internationale du travail et de l'Organisation pour la sécurité et la coopération en Europe.

35. Dans la mesure où la charte doit surpasser la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme et des libertés fondamentales (1950), elle constituera un témoignage actualisé des relations entre les citoyens et le nouveau système de gouvernement supranational ou transnational qui prévaut actuellement dans la plupart des pays d'Europe.

36. La mesure dans laquelle la charte doit s'employer à réactualiser ou à affiner le corpus existant des droits afin que ceux-ci soient davantage à l'unisson des préoccupations et aspirations actuelles donnera lieu à un vaste débat. Ce dernier pourra, entre autres, porter sur les droits liés aux polémiques qui agitent actuellement l'opinion : technologies de l'information ou modifications génétiques, par exemple.

Propositions des rapporteurs sur le contenu

37. Les rapporteurs estiment que la convention devrait s'employer à rechercher un vaste consensus européen sur les droits fondamentaux. Si la CEDH et toutes les autres conventions internationales visées dans ce domaine doivent en constituer la base, les autres catégories de droits à inclure devraient relever des catégories suivantes :

- * droits communs à tous les États membres;
- * droits sociaux et économiques;
- * droits dérivés des clauses du traité sur l'UE sur la citoyenneté;
- * droits "modernes" (société de l'information, identité génétique, par exemple);
- * droits spécifiques à une catégorie de la population (femmes, enfants, par exemple).

38. La convention devrait instituer des comités de rédaction chargés de couvrir chacun de ces éventails de questions.
39. Il importe de clarifier aussi tôt que possible le point de savoir si le Conseil européen préconise de se référer à la Charte sociale européenne signée à Turin en 1961, ou à sa version profondément remaniée de 1996, qui n'a pas encore été signée ou ratifiée par tous les États membres.

V. Relations avec la CIG

40. Les rapporteurs estiment qu'il convient d'établir la plus étroite corrélation possible entre la charte et la CIG. Certaines questions importantes se posent en effet, dont celle de savoir si l'Union doit être dotée d'une personnalité juridique pour pouvoir signer la CEDH n'est pas la moindre.
41. Si les droits prescrits dans la charte sont susceptibles d'un recours judiciaire, la Cour européenne de justice de Luxembourg sera tôt ou tard amenée à développer une jurisprudence dans ce domaine. D'où une concurrence éventuelle – et, en tout état de cause, une coordination indispensable – avec l'ordre juridique et judiciaire de la Cour européenne des droits de l'homme. Nul doute que des divergences d'opinion se feront jour dans les milieux spécialisés ou judiciaires quant à la mesure dans laquelle une telle situation peut être gérable.
42. Comme toujours lorsqu'il s'agit de questions constitutionnelles, l'un des problèmes les plus fondamentaux, mais généralement guère pris en considération, a trait à la conception des voies et moyens qui permettront à l'avenir d'amender la charte pour tenir compte d'une conjoncture politique changeante et de l'évolution du partage des pouvoirs entre les institutions de l'Union européenne et les États membres.
43. Compte tenu de la complexité de la tâche qui nous attend, et dont le présent document n'offre qu'un aperçu, il apparaît clairement que l'élaboration de cette charte aura un impact significatif sur l'issue de la CIG – ne fût-ce que pour ce qui est du rôle, des ressources et des pratiques de la CJCE, de la personnalité juridique de l'Union, de la définition du principe de subsidiarité et des modalités de la future révision du traité.

DELEGATION OF THE BODY DEALING WITH THE CHARTER OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS OF THE EUROPEAN UNION

MINUTES

of the meeting of 14 December 1999

STRASBOURG

SUMMARY

1. Opening statement by the Chairman of the Delegation

Mr Mendez de Vigo, Chairman of the Delegation, opened the meeting. He first announced that the Delegation's decision on the election of Vice-Presidents would be postponed until the next meeting, to permit the Socialist Group to choose its candidate. He then outlined the outcome of his discussions with the Council presidency on the organisation of the constituent meeting of the Charter Body on Friday 17 December in Brussels on the Council's premises. There had been a number of positive developments (for instance the acceptance of the Delegation's idea that Members of the Body should sit in alphabetical order), but one negative development, that the Council would only allow full members of the Body into the main meeting room, with substitute members being relegated to a "salle d'écoute".

Mr Mendez de Vigo went on to describe the proposed order of business of the constituent meeting. The Finnish Presidency representative (Mr Nikula) would chair the beginning of the meeting, until the Body had elected its new President. The next step would consist of the election of the Body's Bureau. If a Member State representative were chosen (e.g. Mr Herzog) there would be a Vice-President from the European Parliament delegation, and a further Vice-President from among the national parliament representatives. If a Member State representative were chosen, the Council would also be seeking a representative, who would be a Portuguese national for the first six months, and a French national for the rest of the year.

Mr Mendez de Vigo concluded his opening remarks by outlining the proposed future timetable for the work of the Body. The month of January would be used for the preparation of the necessary organisational decisions. The next meeting of the full Body would take place on 1-2 February 2000 on the Parliament's premises. From February to June the proposed three Working Groups (on civil and political rights, economic and social rights, and the rights linked with European citizenship) would establish their initial lists of rights. A member of the Body could sit in any or all of these Working Groups. From July to October there would be more detailed examination of the outstanding legal problems, such as the issue of the binding nature of the Charter, insertion into the Treaty, jurisdictional control and links with the Council of Europe Convention.

In the subsequent discussion the following spoke: Mr Watson, Ms Maij-Weggen, Mr Schulz, Mr Bonde, Mr Berthu, Mr Voggenhuber, Ms Paciotti, Ms Frahm, Mr Duff, Ms Cederschiöld, Mr Friedrich, Ms Iivari, Mr Rack, Ms Kaufmann, Ms van den Burg, Mr Dehousse and Ms Beres. The following main issues were raised.

2. Name of the Body

Most of those who spoke supported the use of the name “Convention” (and its different transcriptions into other languages), rather than the “Body” or the “Enceinte”. The suggested use of the term “Grand Committee” in English was strongly opposed by Graham Watson and Andrew Duff. The only member who dissented was Mr Berthu, who supported use of the term “Délégation Conjointe”.

3. Composition of the Body

It was considered to be positive that there were so many former MEPs among the national parliament representatives, and that two of the drafters of the current Spanish Constitution were among the Spanish representatives. On the other hand, a negative factor was that there were too few women. A couple of speakers thus suggested that it would be appropriate for a woman to be one of the Vice-Presidents of the Body.

4. The need for autonomy of the Body

Mr Schulz, Ms Beres and a number of other speakers emphasised the central need for the Body, once constituted, to see itself as independent, and not to be bound by decisions of third parties. It should thus have autonomy in establishing its own rules and procedures.

5. The issue of substitutes/alternates

Practically all who spoke objected strongly to the decision to exclude substitutes from the main meeting room at the constituent meeting of the Body. Mr Mendez de Vigo pointed out that this would not be the case at the next meeting of the Body on the Parliament’s premises, but undertook to make further efforts as regards the Council decision on attendance at the constituent meeting.

6. The President of the Body

Support was expressed by many members for the candidacy of Mr Herzog as President of the Body.

7. Composition of the Bureau of the Body

Concern was expressed at the proposal that there be an additional Council representative on the Bureau, besides the representative of the Member States, of the European Parliament, of the national parliaments and of the Commission.

8. Feedback from the Bureau

The importance of the European Parliament Delegation being regularly and properly notified of the results of the Bureau's deliberations was emphasised, notably by Mr Rack.

9. Number and subject matter of the Working Groups

Dissatisfaction was expressed (notably by Ms Paciotti) at the third of the three proposed Working Groups, that concerning rights linked to citizenship, which was considered to totally overlap the first two proposed Working Groups. In addition, Mr Bonde and others supported the creation of an additional Working Group on collective rights. The issue of the working method of these groups was also raised, such as whether they should each have their own rapporteur.

10. Proposed timetable

Concern was expressed that time had already been lost, and that scheduling the second meeting of the full Body at the beginning of February meant that too much time would elapse before the proper work would begin, and that the rhythm of subsequent meetings of the full Body was also too leisurely.

11. The issue of the Body's secretariat

The nature of the relationship between the Council secretariat and that of the Parliament's responsible services was raised, in particular, by Ms Maij-Weggen and Mr Schulz.

12. Language regime

Ms Kaufmann called for there to be full linguistic coverage of the various documents at subsequent meetings.

13. Media/information strategy

Several speakers raised the issue of the nature of relations with the press, and of information strategy in general.

14. Openness of proceedings

The need for openness of the proceedings to NGOs and to civil society was emphasised by certain participants. It was pointed out that the meetings of the Body would, as a matter of principle, be open to the public.

15. Overall method for the work of the Body

Should it be evolutionary rather than revolutionary, or should "audace" prevail over "prudence"?

16. Next meetings

It was proposed that there be further meetings of Parliament's Delegation to the Body on 18 January 2000 in Strasbourg (at 11 a.m.), and on 26 January in Brussels (at 9 a.m.).

- having regard to the outstanding importance of the forthcoming enlargement of the Union and the Intergovernmental Conference,
  - having regard to the setting-up on 17 December 1999 in Brussels of the Convention to draft a European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights,
  - having regard to Rule 47(1) of its Rules of Procedure,
  - having regard to the report of the Committee on Constitutional Affairs and the opinions of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Human Rights, Common Security and Defence Policy, the Committee on Citizens' Freedoms and Rights, Justice and Home Affairs, the Committee on Legal Affairs and the Internal Market, the Committee on Women's Rights and Equal Opportunities, the Committee on Petitions and the Committee on Employment and Social Affairs (A5-0064/2000),
- A. whereas the Union is founded on the principles of liberty, democracy, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and the rule of law (Article 6 of the EU Treaty),
- B. whereas the creation of an ever closer Union among the peoples of Europe (Article 1 of the EU Treaty) and the maintenance and development of the Union as an area of freedom, security and justice (Article 2 of the EU Treaty) are based on general and absolute respect for human dignity, which is unique to each person, yet common to all, and inviolable,
- C. whereas the Union must respect 'fundamental rights, as guaranteed by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms signed in Rome on 4 November 1950 and as they result from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States, as general principles of Community law' (Article 6 of the EU Treaty),
- D. whereas some specific rights are already enshrined in the Treaties,
- E. whereas the fundamental freedoms, rights and obligations unavoidably stemming from the recognition of human dignity require genuine, comprehensive legal protection and effective legal guarantees,
- F. whereas the primacy of Union law and significant powers of its institutions, which affect individuals make it necessary to strengthen the protection of fundamental rights at European Union level,
- G. whereas the increase in the powers of the Union and the European Community, especially in the sensitive field of internal security, together with the limits on parliamentary or judicial controls in that field, make it obvious that there is an urgent need for a European Charter of Fundamental Rights,
- H. whereas as the Union develops an imbalance must not be created between the objective of security and the principles of freedom and law,
- I. whereas fundamental freedoms can be restricted without parliamentary approval, both in the framework of the Union Treaty and of Community law, despite the fact that this is incompatible with the common constitutional traditions of Member States,

- J. whereas, even in the case of legitimate restrictions of fundamental rights, the inherent nature of such rights may in no case be infringed,
- K. whereas fundamental social freedoms ought to be strengthened and developed at European Union level,
- L. whereas the Union's common foreign and security policy, which will in future include defence, must be developed in compliance with fundamental rights,
- M. whereas new conflicts with fundamental freedoms can arise from developments in, for example, biotechnology or information technology, which can better be dealt with by means of a European consensus on fundamental rights,
- N. whereas there are serious indications of a rise in racism and xenophobia,
- O. whereas the human right to asylum must be maintained according to the provisions of the Amsterdam Treaty,
- P. whereas a European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights, in the same way as the existing provisions concerning fundamental rights in the Member States, should not in any way conflict with the European Convention on Human Rights,
- Q. whereas the Union's accession to the European Convention on Human Rights following the necessary amendments to the EU Treaty would represent an important step towards the strengthening of the protection of fundamental rights in the Union,
- R. whereas the creation of an ever closer union among the peoples of Europe is inseparably linked with the task of increasing, in addition to fundamental rights, citizens' rights, namely the political, economic and social rights associated with Union citizenship,
- S. whereas a charter of fundamental rights constituting merely a non-binding declaration and, in addition, doing no more than merely listing existing rights, would disappoint citizens' legitimate expectations,
- T. whereas the Charter of Fundamental Rights should be regarded as a basic component of the necessary process of equipping the European Union with a constitution,
1. Welcomes the drafting of a European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights, which will contribute to defining a collective patrimony of values and principles and a shared system of fundamental rights which bind citizens together and underpin the Union's internal policies and its policies involving third countries; welcomes therefore the progress made in this connection since the European Council meeting in Tampere, in particular the successful establishment of the joint Convention composed of representatives of the Heads of State and Government, the European Parliament, the parliaments of the Member States and the Commission;
  2. Offers its full support and cooperation in drafting the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union;

3. Notes that the recognition and shaping of fundamental and citizens' rights is one of the primary tasks of parliaments;
4. Calls on its delegation to the Convention drafting the charter vigorously to defend the position set out in this resolution;
5. Intends to vote in plenary on the adoption of the Charter at the appropriate time and deems it advisable to publish in advance its objectives regarding the Charter of Fundamental Rights as set out hereunder;
6. Points out that its final assent to a Charter of Fundamental Rights depends to a large extent upon whether the charter:
  - a. has fully binding legal status by being incorporated into the EU Treaty;
  - b. subjects any amendment of the Charter to the same procedure as its original drafting, including the formal right of assent for the European Parliament;
  - c. contains a clause, requiring the consent of the European Parliament whenever fundamental rights are to be affected;
  - d. contains a clause stipulating that none of its provisions may be interpreted in a restrictive manner with regard to the protection guaranteed by Article 6(2) of the Treaty on European Union;
  - e. recognises that fundamental rights are indivisible by making the charter applicable to all the European Union's institutions and bodies and all its policies, including those contained in the second and third pillars in the context of the powers and functions conferred upon it by the Treaties;
  - f. is binding upon the Member States when applying or transposing provisions of Community law;
  - g. is innovative in nature by also giving legal protection to the peoples of the European Union in respect of new threats to fundamental rights, for example from the fields of information technology and biotechnologies, and establishes new agreements on fundamental rights, in relation for example to equal treatment for women, the general non-discrimination clause and environmental protection;
7. Resolves to hold a scientific colloquium to advise Parliament and to carry out public hearings of representatives of society in general;
8. Will strongly support initiatives for a broad societal discussion in the Member States, involving social partners, NGOs and other representatives of civil society.
9. Calls for recognition of the contribution that can be made by organisations representing civil society to the drafting of the Charter;

10. Proposes to grant the States applying for accession observer status in the Convention drafting the Charter and to begin a continuous exchange of opinions with them in the context of the European Conference;
11. Emphasises that the charter should not replace or encroach upon the Member States' provisions concerning fundamental rights;
12. Supports the agreement reached by the Convention that the charter should be drafted on the presumption that it will have full legal force;
13. Emphasises the need to incorporate in the charter, in addition to the rights already enshrined in the EU Treaty, the standards applicable to the Union that are set out in the international conventions signed by the Member States within the context of the United Nations, the Council of Europe, the International Labour Organisation and the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe;
14. Calls upon the IGC to:
  - (a) put the incorporation into the Treaty of the Charter of Fundamental Rights on its agenda and to give it at that conference the position which it deserves in view of its paramount importance for an ever closer union among the peoples of Europe;
  - (b) enable the Union to become a party to the ECHR so as to establish close cooperation with the Council of Europe and to avoid possible conflicts or overlapping between the Court of Justice of the European Communities and the European Court of Human Rights;
  - (c) give all persons under its protection access to the Court of Justice of the European Communities by supplementing existing mechanisms for judicial review;
16. Calls on its President to forward this resolution to the Commission, the Council, the Court of Justice, the European Court of Human Rights, the IGC, the Convention responsible for drafting the European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights and the parliaments of the Member States..

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT

Purposes of the Union

1. The European Union is ‘founded on the principles of liberty, democracy, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the rule of law’ (Article 6(1) TEU). It aims to promote universal respect and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms as proclaimed by the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1948. By entrenching the duty to solidarity, the Union has enshrined the right of its citizens to peace. One of the Union’s main political and economic objectives is to enable the free movement of people between its Member States. Discrimination on the grounds of nationality is prohibited (Article 12 TEC), and the Union ‘may take appropriate action to combat discrimination based on sex, racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation’ (Article 13 TEC).

Shortcomings in present rights regimes

2. However, the current situation is unsatisfactory in at least three respects. First, the rights regime of the European Union is inconsistent in terms of content as well as variable in terms of implementation and levels of enforcement between Member States. For example, although one feature common to all Member States is the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR) of 1950, not all its subsequent protocols have been signed or ratified by all Member States. The variation in the field of social policy conventions of the Council of Europe and the International Labour Organisation is yet more marked.

3. Second, although the European Union ‘shall respect fundamental rights, as guaranteed by the ECHR and as they result from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States, as general principles of Community law’ (Article 6(2) TEU), it is in an anomalous situation with respect to its Member States because it is not itself a signatory of the Convention. Arguments about Union competence, however, should not be allowed to get in the way of action to prevent the further deterioration of human rights in Europe. The European Union needs a human rights policy to combat racism and xenophobia, to improve the treatment of refugees, and to eliminate vicarious discrimination.

4. Third, the steady but complex development of European integration over fifty years has left the relationship between the citizen and the European Union authorities somewhat lacking in clarity and precision. Behind the question of citizens’ rights lies the problem of democratic legitimacy. The European Parliament believes that a consolidation of the one will enhance the other.

European Union citizenship

5. Within the Treaties of the European Union that bind the Union institutions and Member States together, and in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice (ECJ), the recognition of the need to define and ensure observance of fundamental rights for the citizen of the European Union has developed gradually. The Treaty of Amsterdam even goes so far as to allow membership of the Union to be suspended in the case of a ‘serious and persistent breach’ of human rights (Article 7 TEU).

6. The Treaty of Maastricht established citizenship of the Union, which it defined as having the nationality of a member state. ‘Citizenship of the Union shall complement and not replace national citizenship’ (Article 17(1) TEC); but Article 18 opens up the prospect of further enhancement of the concept of EU citizenship in order to facilitate freedom of movement. This underscores the importance of the principle of subsidiarity in developing EU citizenship.

Subsidiarity

7. The application of the principle of subsidiarity to the EU Charter implies non-interference in the relationship between national citizens and their own state authorities in matters that do not concern the implementation of EU law and policy. However, in the European Union such rigid distinctions are difficult to draw. Powers and responsibilities are more often shared between the EU level and member state governments than they are delegated exclusively to the EU institutions. There is no right of general competence for the EU, and all efforts to establish a definitive catalogue of competences in the classical federal sense are likely to be in vain.

8. The fact is that the federalist principle of subsidiarity does not sit easily alongside the concept of fundamental rights. Whereas, on the one hand, it is legitimate for the drafters of the Charter to take cognisance of subsidiarity, it is also legitimate to argue that subsidiarity should take its place only as one of several general principles that guide the Union. Subsidiarity should not be regarded as an overriding constraint on the central powers of the Union; nor should it be elevated beyond its station to become an impediment to the fundamental nature of a European Union rights regime.

The Charter as means of reform

9. Indeed, the fundamental nature of the rights enshrined in the Charter is destined to become another driving force behind the European Union. To some extent, the introduction of binding rights alters the paradigm of European integration. The Charter is a dynamic project, which will redefine where power lies. The Charter will have consequences for the share out of competency within the Union. The Charter is a means towards the further political reform of the Union.

10. The Union has still not absorbed all the changes wrought by the last Treaty revision at Amsterdam, in particular the advances being made towards creating an area of freedom, security and justice. But the prospect of imminent further enlargement as well as the failure of Amsterdam to solve all the outstanding constitutional problems of the Union has made a new Intergovernmental Conference (IGC) both inevitable and desirable. The European Parliament confirms its belief that it is in the interests of all its present and future citizens that the Union should now collect, review, distil and then write down in simple and elegant language a set of European fundamental rights in the form of a Charter.

11. The June 1999 decision of the European Council at Cologne, which the Parliament welcomes, to draft a Charter of Fundamental Rights should not be seen as an attempt to subvert the existing constitutional order of Member States, but, rather, to strengthen the identity of the European Union. The Charter will contribute to the definition of the collective patrimony of values and rights which bind Europeans together and underpin all the Union’s policies.

12. The prospect of imminent enlargement of the Union to countries whose democratic history is shorter than that of the current Member States accentuates the need to sharpen the profile of the Union in terms of democracy, social justice, ecology and human rights. The Charter will do that, even if it effectively raises the eventual threshold of membership. It is part of the process of preparing the Union for enlargement.

Mandatory effect

13. The European Union is not a state but a powerful union of states exercising authority over people whose rights deserve credible and comprehensive protection. For this reason, the Parliament insists that the Charter should be included eventually within the Treaty on European Union so that it should have legal effect upon the institutions and agencies of the European Union. There are various ways in which incorporation in the Treaty could be achieved, and each would have a different legal effect. The Parliament will wish to return to this issue as the Convention and the IGC begin to make headway in their work.

14. But we can see no real benefit in a Charter of Rights which merely proclaims an existing set of rights. Indeed, we fear that the public may be rather cynical about the publication of yet another piece of Euro-rhetoric, however stylish and well-meaning.

15. A non-binding Charter would also have no relevance at all for third countries in informing their relations with the Union.

16. Furthermore, a Charter that was a non-binding declaration would fail to resolve one of the existing serious contradictions in the constitutional development of the European Union. The Union would be laying claim to the existence of fundamental rights at Union level, yet in striking breach of the constitutional traditions of Member States that it is pledged to uphold, it would not be installing a concomitant legal remedy. Due process of judicial review and the capacity to seek redress is an integral part of the rights regimes of Member States. Do we really want the Union to be less than the sum of its parts in respect of citizens' rights?

17. That is why we propose that, notwithstanding a final decision about the legal character of the Charter, the Convention should proceed on the presumption that it will have a mandatory character.

18. The Parliament is also anxious to ensure the closest possible collaboration between the work of the Convention and the IGC. A mandatory Charter will require several adjustments to be made to the Treaty as well as other, sub-Treaty, reforms.

Respect for the acquis

19. The European Union Charter must not reduce the rights of any existing citizen. Nor should it undermine the ECHR. On the contrary, it should expressly safeguard the existing human rights acquis of each member state, after the manner of Article 53 of the ECHR, while not undermining the important general principle of European Community law concerning uniformity of application. The Charter must maximise legal certainty in all cases.

Community or Union?

20. With regard to the question of the demarcation between the European Community and the European Union, the European Council has proposed a Charter of the Union. As referred to above, citizenship of the Union is established under the provisions of the Treaty establishing the European Community, and it is only the European Community at present that enjoys legal personality in international law.

21. As the Treaty of Amsterdam is brought into effect, and as the international profile of the Union continues to grow, the distinction between the three pillars of Maastricht becomes increasingly academic. Convergence between the three would be the natural consequence of a more comprehensive and coordinated approach to integration by all concerned. The distinction of the pillars is not, at any rate, appreciated by the citizen, for whom, no doubt, a single Charter of Rights covering the whole spectrum of EU activity would make sense. This is also true for foreign companies operating inside the EU, for whom the Charter may have some profound implications.

22. Moreover, many of the most sensitive questions concerning fundamental rights lie in the second and third pillars. The effective incarnation of a common foreign and security policy poses new challenges for the Union in the field of ethics, in the behaviour of EU representatives abroad, and in the treatment of foreign nationals. Progress towards common asylum and immigration policies promotes new categories of legitimate minorities within the Union. And developments in cooperation between member state police and judicial authorities, such as the creation of Europol and the incorporation of the Schengen Agreement within the Treaty on European Union, have a potentially dramatic impact on the relationship between the EU institutions and its agencies on the one hand and the citizen on the other. We are also mindful of the likelihood that the IGC will further extend the competence of the Union to cover defence policy.

23. The European Parliament believes that all fundamental rights are interdependent, and that it would be crazy to connive in allowing two competing legal systems to develop for the protection of fundamental rights according to whether the measures at issue were covered by the EEC Treaty (crossing external borders, asylum, immigration, legal cooperation in civil matters) or by the Treaty on European Union (criminal matters). Therefore, notwithstanding the different mix of competences between Member States and institutions according to policy area and legal base, we are reinforced in our view that the Charter must embrace the whole work of the Union. This implies that the Union itself must obtain legal personality.

Relationship with the Council of Europe

24. It is clear that the European Convention is to be the foundation document of the Charter. The accession of the European Community to the Convention has been under discussion for many years. The launching of the project of the Charter adds new urgency to that debate. In order to guarantee scrupulous respect of the ECHR and to overcome the current anomalous position of the EU institutions, the European Parliament believes that the Union itself should sign up to and ratify the ECHR and all its protocols. As the Court of Justice has proposed (Opinion 2/94), this requires Treaty amendment in order to obtain full legal personality for the European Union.

25. The Union should not seek to become a 'Member State' of the Council of Europe but, merely, a 'High Contracting Party' to the ECHR. In this way problems of dual representation and the participation of the Union in the political organs of the Council could be avoided.

26. There are, however, legitimate fears that for the Union to become a High Contracting Party of the ECHR would threaten conflict and duplication between the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg and the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. However, under Article 32.2 of the ECHR in the event of any dispute as to whether the Strasbourg Court has jurisdiction, it is that Court that shall decide. Article 55 (ECHR) precludes other means of dispute settlement except by special agreement. Such an arrangement would be required to square the obligations of signing the ECHR with Article 292 of the Treaty establishing the European Community, in which Member States undertake not to submit a dispute concerning the interpretation or application of the Treaty to any third party method of settlement. A special protocol could be arranged to manage the transverse relationship between the Court of Justice and their colleagues down the road in the Court of Human Rights.

27. The Treaty of Amsterdam has already granted the ECJ competence over human rights issues (Article 46 TEU). The Luxembourg Court would certainly be capable of developing its own jurisprudence in human rights issues, as national courts have done, while recognising the supremacy of Strasbourg in the last resort. The risk of duplication with Strasbourg can be minimised by respecting Article 35.2(b) of the ECHR, which states that the Strasbourg Court will decline the admissibility of applications that have ‘already been submitted to another procedure of international investigation or settlement and contains no relevant new information’.

28. The role of the Council of Europe’s Court of Human Rights is to hear cases that concern breaches of the ECHR. The role of the EU’s Court of Justice is to hear cases that concern breaches of the EU Treaties. Both Courts are supreme in their own field of application. To date, both Courts have shown mutual respect for the other’s jurisdiction, and they can be expected to continue to use common sense in this regard. The ECJ will be able to accept the supremacy of Strasbourg in the human rights field in just the same way as it has accepted the arbitration of the WTO in trade disputes.

29. The ECHR, while universal in its application to individuals, is likely to remain more restricted in substantive terms than that of the EU Charter. Not only will the latter bear upon special categories of rights for EU citizens and resident foreigners, but it is also likely to be more egalitarian and progressive in its formulation of certain rights in civic, social, environmental and other fields. In that the ties that bind Member States of the European Union are much tighter than those that commit Member States of the Council of Europe, the EU Charter is bound to have a wider scope than that of the ECHR. For example, whereas Protocol No. 4 of the ECHR lays down the right to move freely within and to leave its signatory states, the EU Charter will seek to give effect to the right to freedom of movement and residence between its Member States.<sup>6</sup>

Reform of the Court of Justice

30. That the ECJ will become competent in human rights issues offers the prospect of speedier and cheaper form of judgments than that which is possible under current procedures at the European Court of Human Rights. If the Charter is to be justiciable by the Court of Justice, Article 230 TEC will need to be given a more flexible interpretation in order to improve the individual access of the EU citizen. It may even need Treaty amendment to reclassify the EU citizen as a privileged litigant: Article 34 ECHR concerning individual applications may be a model. In any case, changes to the working methods of the Court and an increase in its resources will be necessary to ensure the smooth and speedy administration of justice in more case-work over a wider field.

<sup>6</sup> Another example: whereas the EU Charter is likely to insist on a general prohibition of discrimination on the grounds of gender, Article 14 ECHR only pertains to sex discrimination in relation to the other rights of the Convention.

Field of application

31. In the Roman tradition, rights exist only by virtue of law. Rights can be permissive (by granting liberties), immunity (by offering protection), prohibitive (by imposing duties and impediments) or procedural (by regulating the legal system). The Charter will need to establish coherence and interdependence between these all these types of rights, and consistency between the internal and external stance of the Union.

32. The Parliament wants the Charter to be ambitious, and to write down in Treaty form modern fundamental civil and social rights as well as to reiterate rights well established elsewhere. This does not mean that the Union would be thereby granting itself new competences directly by virtue of the Charter. EU competences, after all, can only be extended by precise Treaty provision (constrained by the twin principles of subsidiarity and proportionality). The main purpose of the Charter is to establish for the sake of the citizen that the Union fully respects and guarantees modern standards of fundamental rights in those areas where it is competent to do so. Its purpose is not to compensate for legislative shortcomings in all and sundry policy areas. But the Charter can point the way towards future changes in the dispersal of competency between the supranational and national authorities.

33. To whom, then, is the Charter to be addressed? Broadly speaking, bearers of rights are either individuals or groups. They will enjoy one or more of three broad categories of rights, as follows:

- human rights as enshrined in international law claiming universal application;
- fundamental rights applicable to all those within the judicial area of the European Union;
- civil rights applying only to citizens of the European Union.

Human rights content

34. Once the Union has ascribed to the European Convention, the Charter should reaffirm the fundamental human rights contained therein, along with the prescribed procedures. The principal conditions of the ECHR are as follows:<sup>7</sup>

Right to life
 Abolition of the death penalty
 Prohibition of torture
 Prohibition of slavery and forced labour
 Right to liberty and security
 Prohibition of discrimination
 Right to a fair trial
 No punishment without law
 Right to an effective remedy
 Right of appeal in criminal matters
 Compensation for wrongful conviction

<sup>7</sup> The headings listed were added to the original Convention and subsequent Protocols by the provisions of Protocol No. 11 of 1994.

Right not to be tried or punished twice
 Prohibition of imprisonment for debt
 Right to respect for private and family life
 Protection of property
 Freedom of thought, conscience and religion
 Freedom of expression
 Freedom of assembly and association
 Right to marry
 Equality between spouses
 Right to education
 Right to free elections
 Freedom of movement
 Prohibition of expulsion of nationals
 Prohibition of collective expulsion of aliens
 Procedural safeguards relating to expulsion of aliens

Obligation to respect human rights
 Derogation in time of emergency
 Restrictions on political activity of aliens
 Prohibition of abuse of rights
 Limitation on use of restrictions on rights
 Safeguard for existing human rights

Social rights content

35. In June 1999 the European Council at Cologne already proposed that in addition to containing the ‘fundamental rights and freedoms as well as basic procedural rights guaranteed by the ECHR and derived from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States’, the EU’s Charter should also include the ‘fundamental rights that pertain only to the Union’s citizens’. In addition, account should be taken of ‘economic and social rights as contained in the European Social Charter and the Community Charter of the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers (Article 136 TEC), insofar as they do not merely establish objectives for action by the Union’<sup>8</sup>.

36. Controversy over the application of the principle of subsidiarity is likely to be greatest in the social field. Many, for example, have argued for a complete integration of social and civic rights; some have argued for specific demands for social progress, such as good housing, to become a fundamental right. As the Treaty stands at present, however, such a ‘right’ would not be a matter for the European Union but for Member States. The Union is not yet competent in housing policy and cannot offer legal remedies to the homeless. The same would apply to the jobless, where the Union currently only has the power to encourage high levels of employment. The Union has no existing competence in pay, freedom of association or the right to strike.

37. The Parliament believes, nevertheless, that the Charter should fully reflect the importance of the social dimension of the activities of the Union, including the centrality of social cohesion to its economic policy orientations. The single market has implications for social policy that are not yet legislated for at the EU level. Special emphasis should be given to equality between men and women, to the rights of the disabled and of children. The core texts on which to draw are Articles 13 and 136 TEC, the Council of Europe's European Social Charter of 1996 and the Community Charter of the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers adopted by eleven members of the European Council in Strasbourg in December 1989.

38. The Treaty recognises that sex equality is not restricted to employment policy. Article 3.2 TEC should form the basis of a fundamental individual civil right of a generalised prohibition against discrimination on the grounds of gender.

39. Similar general anti-discrimination clauses should be included to address the issues of race, belief, disability, age and sexual orientation.

Other content

40. Existing Union competences that may engender legitimate proposals for the inclusion of individual or collective rights in the Charter are as follows:

- i. the refinement, consolidation and development of European Union citizenship;
- ii. the treatment of third country nationals;
- iii. the position of regional and ethnic minorities;
- iv. the operation of the single market, including commercial policy;
- v. the operation of the common policies on money, agriculture, fisheries, transport and environment;
- vi. the operation of programmes to foster employment, economic and social cohesion, research and technological development, vocational training, consumer protection, public health protection and cultural activity;
- vii. overseas aid and development cooperation.

41. Relevant parts of the formal or informal acquis communautaire include the following:

- 1) Joint Declaration by the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, 1977
- 2) Joint Declaration by the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission against Racism and Xenophobia, 1979
- 3) European Parliament Declaration of fundamental rights and freedoms, 1989

The Parliament would wish to draw special attention to No. (3), the De Gucht Report.

42. Member States may wish to elevate some elements drawn from their common constitutional traditions into the Charter. Apart from those established within the ECHR, relevant international treaties (and their subsequent protocols) would include:

- 4) Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948
- 5) UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, 1948
- 6) UN Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, 1951
- 7) UN Convention relating to the Status of Stateless Persons, 1954
- 8) UN International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, 1965
- 9) UN International Covenant on Economics, Social and Cultural Rights, 1966
- 10) UN International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966
- 11) UN Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women, 1979

- 12) UN Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman Degrading Treatment or Punishment, 1984
- 13) UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1989
- 14) UN Basic principles for the Treatment of Prisoners, 1990
- 15) UN Statute of the International Criminal Court 1998
- 16) Council of Europe European Convention on the legal status of migrant workers, 1977
- 17) Council of Europe Convention for the protection of individuals with regard to automatic processing of personal data, 1981
- 18) Council of Europe Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, 1987
- 19) Council of Europe European Charter for Regional and Minority Languages, 1992
- 20) Council of Europe Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, 1995
- 21) Council of Europe European Convention on the exercise of children's rights, 1996
- 22) Council of Europe Additional protocol to the Convention for the protection of human rights and dignity of the human being with regard to the application of biology and medicine, on the prohibition of the cloning of human beings, 1998
- 23) UNESCO Universal Declaration on the Human Genome and Human Rights, 1997
- 24) ILO Convention concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, 1948
- 25) ILO Convention concerning the Application of the Principles of the Right to Organise and to Bargain Collectively, 1949
- 26) ILO Convention concerning Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment, 1988
- 27) ILO Declaration on Fundamental principles and Rights at Work, 1988
- 28) OSCE Charter of Paris for a New Europe, 1990

Amendment and derogation

43. Writing constitutions is usually easier than amending them afterwards. The IGC will need to adopt a provision to revise the Charter. The Parliament has welcomed the innovation of the Convention as a superior method of working to that of the IGC itself. We would support - but insist upon - a repeat of this exercise to supplement or limit the Charter in the future. Similarly, no act of the Commission or Council to derogate from the Charter will be admissible without the Parliament's agreement.

44. If the Convention were to draft a Charter along these lines it would be making a profound contribution towards the constitutionalisation of the European Union. Citizens, candidate countries and the world at large would have a clearer definition of the purpose of the European Union. The concept of a 'people's Europe' would be translated from rhetorical device into political reality.

Minority opinion

By Mr Georges Berthu (Union for Europe of the Nations Group)

The only purported aim of the decision by the Cologne European Council which launched the process of drafting a European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights was to bring together the rights existing at European level in order to give them a higher profile. Unfortunately, this ill-prepared, ambiguous and - from some points of view – even inconsistent decision was bound to open the way for abuses. Indeed, perhaps that is what it was meant to do.

The Duff-Voggenhuber report is the first example. It wants to give the charter an innovative character by adding numerous new rights; it wants to give it independent European status, with the assent of the European Parliament (the Cologne European Council having already ‘forgotten’ the role of the national parliaments in the proclamation of the charter); lastly, it wants to give it binding force and make its application subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice.

To accept this report would be to move towards the adoption of a detailed charter, binding on and common to the whole of Europe, imposing rigid rules on the different peoples defining their rights. In particular, each people could in future alter these rights only with the agreement of the other fourteen. This would be a stifling system, ill-suited to the nature and interests of Europe.

In a Europe of nations, however, each national democracy must retain control over the definition of the rights of its citizens, in accordance with its own culture and evolution. This Europe has no need of some kind of rigid legal coverall. It needs respect for its national democracies and for the identity of its peoples. It needs freedom and diversity.

That is why we are proposing on the one hand a joint declaration setting out the main values shared by the countries of Europe and, on the other, a charter laying down the rules which should govern relations between national democracies, to ensure that they respect each other. This is the thrust of the proposal submitted by Mr Georges Berthu to the body responsible for drafting the Charter of Fundamental Rights.

Drawing up the Charter of Fundamental Rights: principles and criteria

A vast amount of material has been produced on the subject of human rights in Europe and the legal and political issues under discussion are very complex. Nevertheless, it is important for the European Parliament to adopt an initial broad position as soon as possible since, following the decision taken by the Tampere European Council to set up the body responsible for drawing up the draft Charter, Parliament has appointed its 16 representatives and will have to provide them with guidelines within which to work.

The following should be borne in mind:

- On several occasions in recent years Parliament has proposed the adoption of a declaration of fundamental rights as part of a 'Constitution' for the European Union (resolutions of 12 April 1989 and of 10 February 1994);
- In its most recent resolutions, it welcomed 'the decision taken at the Cologne European Council to proceed with drawing up a draft European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights in good time for the December 2000 European Council' (resolution of 16

September 1999); and following the Tampere European Council it welcomed ‘the composition and method of work agreed upon for the body set up to draw up a draft EU Charter of Fundamental Rights’, and declared that it ‘will participate wholeheartedly in this task’ (resolution of 27 October 1999).

The specific task of the Committee on Citizens’ Freedoms and Rights should be to address the issue of what the future Charter should contain. This discussion should in future accompany the work on preparing the draft and contribute to defining the rights which the Charter will enshrine.

In the meantime, however, Parliament may adopt a resolution of a general nature setting out the basic reasoning underlying the definition of the fundamental rights to be enshrined in the Charter in order to provide an initial response to the least controversial problems it raises.

The aim is not to create a new constitutional order designed to take precedence over the constitutional law of the Member States but to:

- strengthen the protection of fundamental rights in relation to the Union’s new tasks and powers, in particular with regard to the gradual establishment of an ‘area of freedom, security and justice’ based on the principles of freedom, equality, solidarity, security and respect for diversity;
- contribute to defining a set of principles capable of providing Europe with an identity as a community of citizens bound together by shared values and of underpinning the Union’s internal policies and its policies involving third countries.

It is important therefore to bear in mind the values and principles - of freedom, democracy and the rule of law – which are already part of the European Union’s shared patrimony and which are specific characteristics of Europe. It has been on the strength of these principles that Europe has been able to build not only an area of economic freedom but an organisation based on solidarity between Member States which, above all else, has ensured peace in Europe, following the disastrous wars of the first half of the century. The creation of the European Union on the basis of the shared values of democracy and the rule of law has not merely resulted in peace now, but has produced a system which ensures peace in the future: in this sense it could perhaps be said that European citizens have won the right to peace.

Clearly, as part of the process that has been outlined, the aim is not merely for the Charter to lay down the rights specific to European citizens, but also the fundamental rights the European Union intends everyone to enjoy.

Although it is the body appointed in line with the Tampere decision which is responsible for identifying the rights to be enshrined in the Charter, Parliament may at this stage point out that the body’s task is not to produce something entirely new but rather to rely on the common legal culture of the countries of Europe as a source of fundamental principles and rights, including the binding international treaties to which the Member States are signatories and their common constitutional traditions. The search for a European identity will thus focus less on territorial or ethnic allegiances and more on ideas of cultural allegiance, based on shared aims. This is the reasoning behind the following conclusions forwarded to the committee responsible for its consideration.

N.B.: The main international conventions referred to have been ratified by all the Member States with the following exceptions: Luxembourg has not ratified ILO Convention No 111 concerning Discrimination in Respect of Employment and Occupation; Council of Europe Convention No 126 for the Protection of National Minorities has not been signed by Belgium or France and has not been ratified by Greece, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal or Sweden; the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court has been ratified only by Italy.

CONCLUSIONS

In the context of the appointment by Parliament of its representatives in the body responsible for drawing up the text of the Charter of Fundamental Rights it is important to spell out the fundamental principles and criteria which must guide the drawing up of the Charter. With this in mind, the Committee on Citizens' Freedoms and Rights, Justice and Home Affairs calls on the Committee on Constitutional Affairs, as the committee responsible, to incorporate the following principles and criteria in its proposal:

1. The drawing up of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union should have a dual aim:
  - (a) to lay down the principles and safeguards which underpin the establishment of the European Union as an 'area of freedom, security and justice' (Article 2(4) of the Treaty on European Union) and therefore the establishment of the Union as a system founded on the principles of the constitutions and legal systems of the Member States (Article 6(1) of the Treaty on European Union);
  - (b) to contribute to defining a collective patrimony of values and principles and a shared system of fundamental rights which bind citizens together and underpin the Union's internal policies and its policies involving third countries;
2. It is essential, in this connection, to bear in mind that the Union is based on the principles of freedom, democracy, the rule of law, and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms; that on the strength of these principles the Union is able to operate on the basis of cooperation and solidarity between the Member States and the peoples of Europe; and that on the strength of these principles the Union has implicitly enshrined its citizens' right to peace.
3. It is also essential for the fundamental rights recognised by the Union to include the rights of Union citizens, the rights of residents of the Union and the rights of all human beings, in accordance with the universal value attached to the dignity of every individual.
4. The fundamental rights recognised by the Union must be drawn from:
  - (a) the rights under the Treaties and secondary legislation: including the traditional freedoms of movement, the principle of non-discrimination, social and political rights and rights relating to the protection of personal data;
  - (b) the rights expressly referred to by the Treaty or the Protocols to the Treaty, such as, primarily, the rights enshrined by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, with particular emphasis on judicial safeguards.

- (c) the rights under the common constitutional traditions of the Member States, in so far as they constitute general legal principles of the Union, in accordance with the methods of the Court of Justice;
- (d) the rights recognised by international acts and covenants entered into by the Member States, including those agreed within the framework of organisations to which all the Member States belong, such as:

GENERAL COMMENTS

Drafting the Charter of Fundamental Rights :some general principles from a gender perspective

The European Parliament has to mandate its delegation to the Body that is being formed with a view to the drafting of the Charter of Fundamental Rights. Many complex questions of both a political and legal nature have to be answered. Given the terms of reference of the Parliament's Committee for Women's Rights and Equal Opportunities the following principles should be taken into account:

1. Since the seventies women's equality in Europe has received an enormous impetus from legally binding instruments developed at the European Community level. Although symbolic politics made by solemn declarations and resolutions are not without meaning, real equality can only be supported by binding instruments. Women as a politically relevant group of European citizens will not be served by more lip-service. In the discussion on the legal character and the scope of application of the envisaged Charter, it is important to bear in mind the people in Europe, women and men, who would like to know the rights concerned and understand the practical relevance.

2. The actual provisions in EU law concerning equal treatment of women and men are accepted as part of the acquis communautaire. They are rooted in the forming of the internal market; this explains their restriction to the labour market. In a Charter of fundamental rights such a limitation of the scope of the sex discrimination clause is no longer justified. The right to equal treatment without distinction based on sex should be extended to all relevant areas of society. The new ‘mainstreaming’ article of the TEC - article 3(2)<sup>9</sup> – also points in that direction.
3. Such an extension of the sex discrimination clause should not be too difficult to accept for the EU Member States, as they have included such clauses in their national constitutions and/or legislation, and/or have accepted such clauses by their ratification of the relevant UN conventions (International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights - ICCPR, art 26<sup>10</sup>; Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women - CEDAW, art. 2<sup>11</sup>).
4. Accession of the EU to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR) – discussed as a possible alternative strategy in relation to the drafting of the new EU-Charter of fundamental rights – has, as far as the mandate of the Women’s Rights Committee is concerned - one serious flaw. The ECHR (article 14<sup>12</sup>) does not directly rule out sex discrimination, but only pertains to sex discrimination in relation to other rights incorporated in that Convention. The drafting process within the Council of Europe of an additional protocol to the Convention with a general anti-discrimination clause is not yet concluded. Regardless of other problems

<sup>9</sup> “In all the activities referred to in this Article, the Community shall aim to eliminate inequalities, and to promote equality, between men and women.”

<sup>10</sup> “All persons are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to the equal protection of the law. In this respect, the law shall prohibit any discrimination and guarantee to all persons equal and effective protection against discrimination on any ground such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.”

<sup>11</sup> “States Parties condemn discrimination against women in all its forms, agree to pursue by all appropriate means and without delay a policy of eliminating discrimination against women and, to this end, undertake:

- (a) To embody the principle of the equality of men and women in their national constitutions or other appropriate legislation if not yet incorporated therein and to ensure, through law and other appropriate means, the practical realisation of this principle;
- (b) To adopt appropriate legislative and other measures, including sanctions where appropriate, prohibiting all discrimination against women;
- (c) To establish legal protection of the rights of women on an equal basis with men and to ensure through competent national tribunals and other public institutions the effective protection of women against any act of discrimination;
- (d) To refrain from engaging in any act or practice of discrimination against women and to ensure that public authorities and institutions shall act in conformity with this obligation;
- (e) To take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against women by any person, organisation or enterprise;
- (f) To take all appropriate measures, including legislation, to modify or abolish existing laws, regulations, customs and practices which constitute discrimination against women;
- (g) To repeal all national penal provisions which constitute discrimination against women.”

<sup>12</sup> “The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.”

concerning such an accession – from the perspective of sex equality policy such a step could therefore only build a partial solution.

5. Serious attention has to be paid to the issue of positive action. The sex-neutral formulation agreed to in the Treaty of Amsterdam (TEC, art. 141(4)<sup>13</sup>) will have to be reconsidered; it contradicts the political will to advance the position of women expressed in EU policy to promote the equality of women and men (articles 2 and 3 of the TEC). Theory building and policy discussion at the global level are far ahead. Art. 4(1) of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) states that ‘... temporary special measures aimed at accelerating de facto equality between men and women shall not be considered discrimination...’, but rules out the maintenance of unequal or separate standards. More attention has to be paid to the growing body of international literature and jurisprudence on women’s human rights, in particular to the recommendations and conclusions of the CEDAW-Committee.
6. Discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation (or: sexual preference) has a special link to sex discrimination. Both phenomena are rooted in a vision of a society where men and women have to play fixed and complementary roles; and where the expression of personal choices outside that given order is felt a threat. The emancipation of women cannot come about without changing that order. Therefore – looking at the Charter of fundamental rights from a gender perspective – the right to equal treatment without distinction based on sexual orientation has to be included.
7. Any suggestion that women’s human rights should come under a heading such as ‘special’ or ‘group’ rights, should be firmly rejected. Women are not a minority or a special kind of human being, let alone a species that has to be protected as such. Women’s rights are an integral part of universal human rights. This principle should not only be recognised at the global level (UN World Conference on Human Rights, Vienna, 1993; Fourth UN World Conference on Women, Beijing, 1995), but also in the EU.
8. Mainstreaming a gender perspective in the field of fundamental rights would also mean looking critically at some concepts included in previous draft texts, resolutions etc. Some clearly outdated notions have to be modernised. In particular, clauses concerning the so-called rights of the family are debatable; human rights are individual rights and not rights of institutions. Moreover, different members of a family often will have different interests and internal power relations within the family may determine the outcome. Likewise, texts that restrict the meaning of ‘work’ to paid employment have to be revised to include – where relevant - unpaid work. The trap of ‘wages for housework’ has to be avoided, however.

<sup>13</sup> “With a view to ensuring full equality in practice between men and women in working life, the principle of equal treatment shall not prevent any Member State from maintaining or adopting measures providing for specific advantages in order to make it easier for the under-represented sex to pursue a vocational activity or to prevent or compensate for disadvantages in professional careers.”

CONCLUSIONS

The Committee on Women's Rights and Equal Opportunities calls on the Committee on Constitutional Affairs, as the committee responsible, to incorporate the following conclusions in its report:

1. The Charter of Fundamental Rights should contain a general anti-sex discrimination clause that is mandatory and which can be invoked before the ECJ by individual citizens/ residents.
2. As long as the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms does not include a general anti-discrimination clause, a possible accession to this Convention by the EU will not solve the issue.
3. An anti-discrimination clause and a provision concerning positive action are two sides of the same coin. Both have to be considered in the political perspective of the promotion of the advancement of women, a long standing priority of the European Union.
4. Women's rights are not 'special' rights, but an integral part of universal human rights. In this respect attention should be paid to the right to physical integrity, which is not adequately guaranteed by the Universal Declaration.
5. The Charter of Fundamental Rights should contain an anti-discrimination clause on the grounds of sexual orientation.
6. More attention has to be paid to the growing body of international literature and jurisprudence on women's human rights, in particular to the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women.
7. Gender mainstreaming in the drafting process of the Charter would comprise, inter alia, a critical revision of concepts in "other" parts of the text. Rights of the family as such do not exist, there are only rights of individual women, men and children.

Committee on Petitions

Draftsperson: Janelly Fourtou

PROCEDURE

The Committee on Petitions appointed Janelly Fourtou draftsman at its meeting of 18 November 1999.

It considered the draft opinion at its meeting of 24 January 2000.

At its meeting of 25 January 2000 it adopted the following conclusions unanimously.

The following were present for the vote: Gemelli, chairman; De Rossa, vice-chairman; Fourtou, draftsman; Gonzalez Álvarez, Lambert, H-P. Mayer, Sornosa Martínez and Wyn.

I. Petitions to the European Parliament and fundamental rights

1. 'I am a European citizen and hence entitled to rights which no-one can ignore or deny me without the European Union intervening'. This is the underlying message behind many of the petitions which European citizens submit to the European Parliament when complaining that their rights have been infringed. People petitioning us demonstrate an obstinate and unflinching conviction that they are entitled to a variety of rights, either recently acquired or the legacy of a culture whose richness and diversity appeal to a number of shared values: for Europeans, what being a citizen of the Union means is sharing in a common destiny.

2. The conviction that these fundamental rights are 'necessary and obligatory' suggests that European citizens are persuaded that there already exists a 'written European constitution' in which all these rights are enshrined. Moreover, these rights should, in their opinion, 'keep pace with' advances in new information technologies (protection of personal data) and genetic engineering, preserve the biosphere and biological diversity, or take account of new lifestyles and do justice to equality between the sexes and, finally, respect the diverse wealth and cultural identities of Europe.

3. Non-Community residents have the same right as European Union citizens to petition the European Parliament. Persons who have found asylum in the European Union are particularly anxious to have these fundamental rights upheld if they are flouted in their country of origin.

4. This is an aspect which the Committee on Petitions should take into consideration when it examines the requests submitted to it in petitions concerning fundamental rights. We set out below the rights most frequently invoked by petitioners complaining to the Committee on Petitions. The list is not intended to be exhaustive; nor does it present the points in any order of importance.

II. List of rights most frequently invoked by petitioners

- a) the right to equality of treatment (non-discrimination);
- b) freedom of thought, conscience and religion;
- c) respect for private life (data-protection);
- d) the right to work and non-discrimination between pay for men and women;
- e) the right to education;
- f) the right to health protection;
- g) the right to the protection of the environment, fauna and flora;
- h) consumer protection;
- i) freedom of movement and right of residence;
- j) the right of asylum and the protection of minorities;
- k) protection of private property;
- l) protection by social security schemes.

III. Final considerations

1. The Committee on Petitions believes it should be fully involved in drawing up the Charter, since it falls within its remit. The fundamental civil right to petition is quite clearly one of the fundamental rights which European citizens wish to exert and which are recognised by the Member States, the Community Institutions, in their own countries and wherever they choose to go in the Union or elsewhere, thanks to diplomatic protection abroad.

2. Furthermore, there is no doubt in the mind of the petitioner that the 'fundamental' nature of these fundamental rights should include protection at law before the courts of the Union, i.e. the acknowledgement that petitioners have the right to appear, as individuals, before the Court of Justice to defend their rights.

3. The body responsible for drawing up the Charter of Fundamental Rights should list, in a single text, the rights recognised as fundamental in the European Union. Once adopted in plenary the draft report should serve as a mandate for Parliament's representatives since it will express the views of Parliament as a whole.

4. The body's work should be guided by two important points:

a) Firstly, it should rectify the fact that provisions on fundamental rights are scattered throughout the Treaties, conventions and protocols. They should be set out in a single, unified text which has the highest possible profile for every citizen of the Union.

b) Fundamental rights must be enforceable at law in view of the fact that the Charter will be binding on the European Institutions, the Member States and citizens of the Union.

This second exchange of views is intended to enable our committee's expectations to be made known to the committee responsible and also to Parliament's delegation to the body drawing up the Charter of Fundamental Rights.

IV. CONCLUSIONS

The Committee on Petitions calls on the Committee on Constitutional Affairs, as the committee responsible, to incorporate the following points in its draft resolution:

1. whereas it should be recognised that citizens of the Member States have the right to exercise and defend a set of fundamental rights, as basic elements of European citizenship and - through the values they express - of the very cultural identity of the Union,
2. whereas the numerous petitions submitted to the European Parliament make it possible to define the perception which people have of the Union and the rights which it has to protect,
3. whereas European citizens regard fundamental rights as being in a state of evolution, having to protect them from dangers which might arise from new information technologies, genetic engineering and pollution of the environment etc.,
4. whereas there is a need to ensure as high a profile as possible for the fundamental rights enjoyed by each citizen of the Union, and whereas maximum protection of such rights should be guaranteed by different instruments ranging from the right to petition to individual recourse to the Court of Justice of the European Communities.

The following took part in the vote: Michel Rocard, chairman; Winfried Menrad, vice-chairman; Ieke van den Burg, draftsman; Sylviane H. Van Lancker, Barbara Weiler and Sabine Zissener (for James L.C. Provan).

BACKGROUND/GENERAL COMMENTS

1. When in March 1996, the Comité des Sages, appointed by the Commission and chaired by Mrs Lourdes de Pintasilgo, presented its report at the first Social Policy Forum, the debate on the question of fundamental (social) rights as a constitutional element of the European Union was finally given a place on the political agenda. The Comité pleaded for the recognition of a series of fundamental civil and social rights and for the incorporation of those rights into the Amsterdam Treaty, based on a two-phase approach. In the short term the European Union should include in the Treaty a minimum set of core fundamental rights and, for the medium term set in motion a broad consultation process. This broad debate in society should update and complete the list of civil, political and social rights and duties, including rights that reflect technological change, the growing awareness of the environment, and the demographic developments. The result of the debate should be an updated "bill of rights" to be incorporated in the EU Treaty.

2. In order to look more deeply into this matter, DG V established an independent group of experts, chaired by Professor Simitis. The expert group's report "Affirming Fundamental Rights in the European Union: Time to Act", published in February 1999, stresses the indivisibility of civil and social rights and pleads for an integrative approach in the European debate. The experts suggest an incorporation of the complete European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and the Protocols to the ECHR as a "common European Bill of Rights", and, as far as social rights are concerned, ask for special attention to be given to the conventions of the ILO. Just like the Comité des Sages, the Simitis-group sees the recognition of fundamental rights as an open process that should lead, in its first phase, to the enumeration of a set of rights incorporating and expanding the ECHR, which, in particular against the background of the decisions of the ECJ and the European Court of Human Rights, should ultimately result in a reformulation of fundamental rights adapted to the experiences and exigencies of the European Union.
3. The Amsterdam Treaty does not contain a basic set of fundamental civil and social rights in the form of a Bill of Rights. Only the principle of equal pay for men and women has been codified in Art. 141 of the EC Treaty. Furthermore, the Treaty explicitly confirms the Union's attachment to fundamental social rights (preamble, fourth recital) without changing the previously adopted system of references. This means that the EU's commitment to the Community Charter is, in fact, rather weak. Also, both the Preamble and Art. 136 of the EC Treaty refer to fundamental social rights by pointing to the 1961 European Social Charter (Council of Europe) and the 1989 Community Charter.
4. Art. 13 of the EC Treaty empowers the Council to take appropriate action to combat discrimination, after consultation of the European Parliament. The possible grounds of intervention are explicitly indicated in Art. 13 and range from discrimination concerning sex, racial or ethnic origin to discrimination regarding religion, belief, disability, age or sexual orientation. Moreover, provisions such as Art. 3 (2) and 141 (4) of the EC Treaty lay the grounds for measures designed to achieve an effective equality of men and women including positive action. The European Commission has recently adopted a communication based on Art. 13, two proposals for legislation and an action programme. The inclusion of equal treatment as a fundamental right in the Treaty as a basic guarantee against discrimination on the grounds mentioned in Art. 13 would help to provide a sounder legal basis for the decision and legislation process in this area.
5. Art. 136 qualifies fundamental social rights, as determined by the European Social Charter and the Community Charter. Both documents are only seen as a basis for Community policies. Art. 137, however, explicitly excludes the right of association, as well as the right to strike and the right to impose lock-outs, from the duty to support and complete the efforts of the Member States designed to implement the social policy aims defined in Art. 136. This means that the European Union is prevented from acting to protect rights that traditionally belong to the core of social rights, and that have been affirmed over and over again by both national laws and international treaties.
6. The Cologne European Council re-launched the debate on fundamental rights, and decided that they should be consolidated in a Charter, to be drafted by a specific body before the European Council in December 2000. The Council stated in particular that, at the drawing up stage of the European Charter of Fundamental Rights, economic and social rights as set out in the European Social Charter and in the Community Charter on Social Rights of Workers should be taken into consideration. The Charter could represent a genuine milestone in the building of a Citizens' Europe.

7. Fundamental social and socio-economic rights have also been formulated in several widely ratified and acknowledged international standards, to which EU Member States have committed themselves, such as:

- The Council of Europe's Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental freedoms (ECHR) (1951)
- The Council of Europe's revised European Social Charter (1960/1996)
- The Community Charter of Fundamental Social Rights of Workers (1989)
- The core Conventions of the International Labour Organisation, summarised and referred to in the recent ILO Declaration on Fundamental Social Rights of Workers (1998)
- The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989)
- The UN convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women (1979).

8. The reason for explicitly committing the European Union to fundamental civil and social rights is the present imbalance in its legal system. The more competencies the EU gets throughout the three pillars, the more it should be made clear to Europe's citizens that the EU fully respects and guarantees fundamental rights and standards. This does not automatically imply an extension of its competencies, as these are defined by precise Treaty provisions and policy chapters and restricted by the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality.

9. The fundamental rights and freedoms to be enshrined in the European legal system should at least conform to the international standards to which most of the Member States are bound.

10. Accession of the EU as a legal entity to these international standards (after solving the current legal problems) would be one method of incorporating fundamental rights and the accompanying procedures for infringement and complaints; explicitly committing the EU and its institutions to the content (including the relevant jurisprudence) of these standards by an explicit formulation and reference in the Treaty would be another.

11. From the perspective of visibility and transparency the inclusion of a well-defined package of rights, inspired by the standards listed under 8, and formulated on the basis of a broad societal debate as promoted by the Comité des Sages (Pintasilgo), would be the optimal final outcome.

12. Fundamental social, and particularly socio-economic, rights often have the characteristics of instruction norms that oblige governments or authorities at lower levels to develop and implement policies that bring these rights within reach for all persons under their jurisdiction. Whereas classical fundamental human rights and freedoms imply an obligation to respect and protect, these social rights merely include the obligation to ensure and promote. Commitment to rights such as the right to work or decent housing thus asks for an active programme of action by the authorities, and not just for passive custody. On the other hand, such rights are less easy for individual persons to seek to uphold in court.

13. Some important fundamental social rights, though, do not differ in nature from the other fundamental (individual or collective) human rights and freedoms. The rights contained in the core ILO conventions for instance, protect against forced labour, child labour and discrimination, and guarantee the right to organise, to bargain collectively and to take recourse to forms of collective action. They contain an obligation to respect and protect. These social rights should thus give individual persons or organisations full access to the courts.

14. The drafting process of the Charter and the parallel discussion on the aims of the Intergovernmental Conference, that should decide to make the Charter a major binding element of the revised Treaty, should be open and transparent. The Tampere mandate provides for hearings and special meetings; the European Parliament should try to be a good host for European NGO's and trade unions, and other organisations, that are likely to have an input into the discussion, and - together with the representatives of the national parliaments - be an intermediary to the general public and stimulate public debate. A working group consisting of members of the Committee on Employment and Social Affairs of the European Parliament and of the Committee on Social Affairs of the Council of Europe has been established in order to discuss how to avoid overlaps and complications, and how to learn from the experiences of implementation and jurisdiction in the Council of Europe's procedures.

CONCLUSIONS

The Committee on Employment and Social Affairs calls on the Committee on Constitutional Affairs, as the committee responsible, to incorporate the following conclusions in its resolution:

1. Advocates simultaneously accession of the EU as a legal entity to international standards, including the accompanying procedures for infringements and complaints, and urges the IGC to extend the reference in Article 6 of the Treaty to the ECHR with references to the European Social Charter, the Community Charter and the core ILO and UN Conventions;
2. Believes that fundamental human and social rights are indivisible and, therefore, stresses the importance of incorporating fundamental social rights in the new EU Treaty with as main objectives:
  - to make them a condition for membership of the EU as is now the case with the reference to the ECHR in Art. 6 and 7 TEU
  - to commit the EU and its institutions to comply with these rights not only in the Social Chapter but in all policy fields
  - to commit EU Member States to comply with these rights in the implementation of EU legislation
  - to provide a legal basis for initiatives of the EU and its institutions
  - to give individual (natural and legal) persons and/or their organisations in the EU (directly or indirectly via national court) access to the European Court of Justice with complaints about infringement by the EU (either the EU institutions or Member States executing EU legislation) on these fundamental rights
  - to make the social dimension of the European Union visible, and enhance the legitimacy and relevance of the EU institutions to public opinion as recommended recently by the Dehaene report;
3. Believes that the content of the set of fundamental social and socio-economic rights should be derived from, and based on, already existing widely ratified and acknowledged international standards, to which EU Member States have committed themselves, such as:

- The Council of Europe's Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental freedoms (ECHR) (1951)
  - The Council of Europe's revised European Social Charter (1960/1996)
  - The Community Charter of Fundamental Social Rights of Workers (1989)
  - The core Conventions of the International Labour Organisation, summarised and referred to in the recent ILO Declaration on Fundamental Social Rights of Workers (1998)
  - The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989)
  - The UN convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women (1979);
4. Asks for due attention for the differences in character of fundamental rights in the social and economic field: some have a more programmatic character and require for action by the authorities, but may be less easily enforceable and justiciable; others are comparable to, and may be integrated in the set of classical fundamental human rights;
  5. Stresses that it is necessary to ensure compliance with such standards and that these standards might need "upgrading" based on new insights and new developments as referred to in the Simitis report and in Art. 13 of the Amsterdam Treaty which contains an extension of the grounds on which discrimination should be fought and, therefore, should also explicitly be included in the formulation of the fundamental equal treatment provision;
  6. Believes that the explicit incorporation of fundamental rights in the EU Treaty should be accompanied by a non-regression-clause ensuring that better or farther reaching provisions in other Member States' (constitutional) legislation and jurisprudence and in international law and jurisdiction, to which Member States are bound, will prevail;
  7. Stresses that it would be logical to revise the present Treaty provisions (Art. 137, 6 TEC) which explicitly exclude EU competence with respect to such fundamental rights such as the freedom of association;
  8. Asks the Convention to take account in the Charter both of the substantive and of the procedural recommendations made by the Pintasilgo Comite and the Simitis group, inter alia regarding the recommendation to incorporate the right to a minimum income, and as to the working method: to launch a broad debate on fundamental rights and to consult and involve civil society, especially non-governmental organisations, in the debate;
  9. Is, however, of the opinion that the Charter of Fundamental Rights, unlike the recommendations made in the Simitis report, must also incorporate the contents of Article 1 of the ECHR, which guarantee persons from third countries the same fundamental rights and freedoms as those enjoyed by the citizens of the signatory states, with the exception of rights granted exclusively to citizens of those states, such as the right to stand for election and the right to vote in elections;
  10. Calls for a good co-operation with the Council of Europe's respective bodies, including also those dealing with the (revised) European Social Charter, throughout the process of dealing with the Charter;

11. Stresses the need to have a further opportunity at a later phase of the proceedings in the Convention to evaluate the development of the draft Charter on Fundamental rights, and to present a more detailed report with recommendations considering its final text;
12. Calls on the European Union, in view of the International Convention on the Rights of the Child, to include a reference in its Charter to the special rights of children;
13. Considers that recognition of social rights as fundamental rights, and therefore their inclusion in the European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights, will, once economic and political union has been achieved, constitute the social and economic dimension of European integration.

PROCEDURE

At its meeting of 30 November 1999 the Committee on Legal Affairs and the Internal Market appointed Charlotte Cederschiöld draftsperson.

It considered the draft opinion at its meetings of 31 January 2000 and 22 February 2000.

At the last meeting it adopted the following conclusions by 12 votes to 8, with 4 abstentions.

The following were present for the vote: Ana Palacio Vallelersundi, chairman; Willi Rothley and Eduard Beysen, vice-chairmen; Charlotte Cederschiöld, draftsperson; Maria Berger, Rolf Berend, (for Joachim Wuermeling, pursuant to Rule 153(2)), Enrico Boselli, Jean-Maurice Dehousse, Enrico Ferri, Janelly Fourtou, Evelyne Gebhardt, Françoise D. Grossetête, Malcolm Harbour, Heidi Anneli Hautala, Ioannis Koukiadis, Kurt Lechner, Donald Neil MacCormick, Toine Manders, Hans-Peter Mayer, Manuel Medina Ortega, Ria G.H.C. Oomen-Ruijten, Carlos Ripoll i Martínez Bedoya, Francesco Enrico Speroni, Antonio Tajani, Felekna Uca, Diana Paulette Wallis, Stefano Zappalà and François Zimeray.

1. Introduction to the legal problem

In all Member States fundamental rights serve mainly in order to protect individuals against possible abuses of public authority and to safeguard the civil society.

Fundamental rights may be used to determine the lawfulness of both individual acts and ordinary laws only if they rank as constitutional law.

The practical value of fundamental rights thus depends on their legal value, in other words on their place in the hierarchy of norms.

According to one possible classification, three sorts of fundamental rights may be distinguished:

- a) 'protective rights' which protect the individual against possible abuse of public authority (e.g. freedom of expression) ('status negativus').

- b) ‘political rights’ which enable the individual to participate in the exercise of public authority (e.g. the right to participate in elections) (‘status activus’).
- c) economic rights.
- d) social rights (which are difficult to guarantee).

The European Union, however, has no text explicitly stating the fundamental rights enjoyed by its citizens. Since 1969 the Court of Justice has developed a rich fundamental rights case-law inspired by the following principles:

“Fundamental rights form an integral part of the general principles of the law, the observance of which is ensured by the Court. In safeguarding those rights, the latter is bound to draw inspiration from constitutional traditions common to the Member States, so that measures which are incompatible with the fundamental rights recognised by the constitutions of those States are unacceptable in the Community. International treaties for the protection of human rights on which the Member States have all collaborated or of which they are signatories, can also supply guidelines which should be followed within the framework of Community law.”

The Court has considered in turn rights such as the right to property, the right to privacy, the right to a fair trial, freedom of expression, the principle of equal treatment, protection of family life, the right to free exercise of professional activities, and many other, mainly procedural, rights.

It may be regretted that the Court’s case law resulted in effective protection on rare occasions only. This means that there is good reason for a more elaborate protection of fundamental rights at EU level.

2. Introduction to the political problem

Fundamental rights have symbolic value. The European Union would be the first international organisation to apply fundamental rights to its internal sphere.

Some objections to the idea of fundamental rights might be based on a misunderstanding. The European Union will not order Member States which fundamental rights to apply in their internal sphere. The purpose of fundamental rights in the EU is to control the acts of its bodies and institutions which might be found to be excessive and to codify and secure the individual rights within the jurisdiction of the EU.

Indeed, some national constitutional courts, such as the German Bundesverfassungsgericht, are experiencing some difficulties in applying certain EU directives on the ground that they are conflict with national fundamental rights. This is the case e.g. in the context of the EU banana regime, the EU anti-tobacco-advertising directive and the EU laying-hens directive. If German courts and authorities no longer applied parts of EU law or German legislation passed to implement directives, the unity of the EU legal order would be threatened.

The only viable solution to this problem would be to introduce a high-profile set of EU fundamental rights which would allow EU acts to be reviewed at European level, thus maintaining the unity of the EU legal order. It should also be stressed how important enforceable procedural rights are for the rule of law.

Besides this protective aspect, fundamental rights could contribute to developing a citizenship of the European Union which does not compete with national citizenships – it would merely supplement them at the EU level. The Charter could thus contribute to the development of a European identity. The forthcoming enlargement of the EU stresses the importance of well-functioning fundamental-rights protection on EU level. This would be an important measure to secure the full respect of fundamental rights in the newcoming Member States. It should be stressed how important enforceable procedural rights are for the rule of law. The introduction of a European code of due process could become the instrument to guarantee these rights of the individuals.

3. Binding instrument vs. non binding instrument

According to the Cologne conclusions the European Council “propose[s] to the European Parliament and the Commission that, together with the Council, they should solemnly proclaim on the basis of the draft document a European Charter of Fundamental Rights.”

At its first meeting on 17 December 1999 the Chair of the ‘Convention’ responsible for drawing up the FRC seemed to assume that the FRC would not be binding immediately, but that it should be framed as if it were to become binding.

From a strictly legal point of view, only a legally binding instrument forming part of primary EU law (i.e. an amendment or protocol to the Treaties) and susceptible of interpretation and application by the Court of Justice (justiciability) makes sense. Only in this way would it be possible for the EU to secure the full respect of fundamental rights in all Member States, including the newcoming Member States.

The legal control of political decisions is weaker in a system based on soft law. The possibilities for the individual citizen to uphold and safeguard his/her rights against authorities are weaker with soft law.

4. How would fundamental rights operate in the EU?

The European Union is not a State. Accordingly, the contents and function of its fundamental rights will not be the same as in a State.

The main function of EU fundamental rights should be to protect individuals in the EU against abusive action by EU institutions and bodies. Such action might consist of decisions applying to individual persons (e.g. a subsidy granted in one case but not granted in an identical case; an undertaking is condemned after an irregular procedure for anti-competitive behaviour), regulations or directives applying to a restricted number of or all individuals (e.g. a regulation prescribes that certain personal data are to be collected), or physical action (e.g. an illegal search of company’s premises by OLAF agents; Europol storing wrong and prejudicial data relating to an individual).

Should a legal act violate an EU fundamental right, the Court of Justice could annul it. Individuals may institute proceedings against decisions and regulations provided that they are directly and individually concerned by them (Article 230 EC). The Court could under certain circumstances also order that a compensation for the damages caused has to be paid to the victim.

In case of illegal physical action, the Court award damages be paid to the victim and/or that the result of the illegal action has to be remedied (e.g. the data unlawfully stored by Europol) and may not be used in other proceedings. The latter mechanisms would have to be put in place by means of an adaptation of the EC Treaty.

Were the FRC to grant positive rights the EU should possess the competences necessary to effectuate them.

All fundamental rights must be seen in relation to EU competences. E.g.: A right of objection to military service would make sense only if there were a European army governed by EU law. It should be noted that EU competences are evolving dynamically. Growing EU competences should thus go hand in hand with the development of corresponding fundamental rights protection.

5. Limits to fundamental rights

In the interest of other right holders and the general public, fundamental rights can obviously not remain without limits.

The Court of Justice has restricted their application in the following way:<sup>14</sup>

„As regards the infringement of the right to property, the Court has consistently held that, while the right to property forms part of the general principles of Community law, it is not an absolute right and must be viewed in relation to its social function. Consequently, its exercise may be restricted, provided that those restrictions in fact correspond to objectives of general interest pursued by the Community and do not constitute a disproportionate and intolerable interference, impairing the very substance of the rights guaranteed [...]“

Article 8(2) of the European Human Rights Convention reads as follows:

“There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.”

The right to pursue a professional activity is another important fundamental right. However, also in this case it will be necessary to allow certain limits in the interest of public security, the well-being of consumers etc.

Another issue to be addressed is the relationship of certain new fundamental rights to the four freedoms and other rights enshrined in the EC Treaty (e.g. the right of assembly (strike) and the free movement of goods).

6. Implementing provisions

Wherever a fundamental right is not just of protective nature it must be implemented by secondary legislation. EU legislation passed as implementing legislation to EU fundamental rights must be proportionate and should avoid any violation of rights of Member States or individuals.

7. Accession to the European Human Rights Convention – role of the European Human Rights Court

In Opinion 2/94 of 28 March 1996, the Court of Justice has ruled out an EC accession to the EHRC as Community law stood at that date for lack of competence of the EC to legislate in the field of human rights. One crucial underlying reason may have been the Court's unwillingness to submit to the rulings of a court where judges from the (presently) 41 Council of Europe Member States would be ruling in Chambers (7 judges) and in a Grand Chamber (17 judges) on the lawfulness of the actions of the European Union, including judges from systems for a long time substantially differing from EU Member States, such as i.e. Albania, Moldavia, Ukraine and Russia.

On the other hand the ECJ indirectly implements the European Convention through general principles of law.

Already in the 70s the ECJ brought attention to the question of fundamental rights application. It is now time to decide if parallel instances in co-operation could better safeguard the rights of present and future citizens, and to create a pan-European fundamental rights protection.

CONCLUSIONS

The Committee on Legal Affairs and the Internal Market calls upon the Committee on Constitutional Affairs to incorporate the following conclusions into its report:

The European Parliament,

1. Underlines the need for developed, codified and secured rights in the European Union;
2. Stresses that the Charter should strive to make existing fundamental rights more visible and deepen and strengthen the culture of rights and responsibilities at all levels across the EU expressing our underlying unity of moral purpose, reinforcing in the minds of administrators, governments, legislators, judges, lawyers and all other citizens the rights they possess and the need to respect them.
3. Takes the view that a Charter of Fundamental Rights should guarantee a comprehensive and effective legal protection of individuals and defined groups of individuals; is of the opinion that the scope of fundamental rights has to cover all the activities of the EU institutions, bodies and agencies, including the second and third pillar and actions of national authorities when they apply EU law and that they should be considered as a complement and not as a substitute to the existing legal systems and traditions of the Member States;
4. Is of the opinion that, from a legal point of view, only a binding fundamental rights charter with the highest legal rank as have the founding Treaties would result in an effective fundamental rights protection;

5. Considers it vitally important to consider the Charter's relationship with other international human rights' instruments and, in particular recalls the unequal value of the European Social Charter in Member States, which does not coincide with the scope of rights contained in Articles 137 et seq. of the TEC;

In the same context, the question of incorporation into the Charter of the public policy clause, which appears in the ECHR, must be given due consideration.

6. Insists that the rights contained in the Charter must be made justiciable by the Court of Justice of the European Communities, subject to careful consideration concerning, and adequate legislative provision forestalling, the risk of multiple, and potentially conflicting, jurisdictions as between the European Court of Human Rights, the Court of Justice, and the highest Constitutional Courts of the Member States;
7. Believes that the issue of balancing fundamental rights in the interest of the general public and other right holders and the issue of legal bases for provisions to implement fundamental rights require in-depth analysis;
8. Believes that the problem of the scope of the Charter which should protect all individuals and the list of rights reserved for European Union citizens require in-depth analysis; the issue of legal bases for implementing provisions for fundamental rights should also be looked at;
9. Considers that the present mechanisms for judicial review (Articles 230, 232, 234, 235, 243 ECT) should be supplemented so as to afford effective fundamental rights protection in the case of illegal physical and other actions performed by institutions and bodies of the EU or actions of national authorities when they apply EU law;
10. Is of the opinion that, from a legal point of view, every effort should be made to ensure that provision is made for an adequate protection procedure in respect of each right recognised by the Charter;

11. Calls upon the General Affairs Council and the Presidency in office of the Council to put the Charter of Fundamental Rights on the agenda for the Intergovernmental Conference;
12. Believes that the adoption of an EU Fundamental Rights Charter will be to the advantage of high-profile pan-European fundamental rights protection;
13. Believes that the European Court of Justice must continue to be the supreme court in the judicial system of the European Union;
14. Asks that the question of some form of co-operation between the ECJ and the European Human Rights Court be studied in order to avoid incongruities arising in the development of European fundamental rights protection;
15. Takes the position that it is one matter to decide on a Fundamental Rights Charter, and another to incorporate it into the Treaty;
16. The Fundamental Rights Charter can lead to a more consistent interpretation of the rule of law, and foster European Identity and European Citizenship;
17. Believes that a charter proposal concentrating on the most fundamental rights which are justiciable in a court would favour the quality of these rights in the Union;

for the Committee on Constitutional Affairs on the drafting of a Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (C5-0058/99 – 1999/2064(COS))

SHORT JUSTIFICATION

I. General remarks on the Charter's features

The Committee on Foreign Affairs wishes to highlight the following points:

1. Should the Charter apply solely to EU citizens within the meaning of Article 8 of the Maastricht Treaty or also cover anyone in the territory of the Union, which includes foreigners and, in particular, immigrants?

The Committee on Foreign Affairs is clearly in favour of the second option because human rights should not be reserved for a category of persons in a given territory. On the other hand, there is nothing to prevent the inclusion in the Charter of a section dealing with citizenship and the specific rights of EU citizens; but such provisions would only concern the right to vote, the right to free movement in the Union, the right to a passport and to diplomatic protection and a few other rights of similar nature. The rights that are truly fundamental must apply to everyone, both citizens and non-citizens.

2. What should be the status and force of the Charter?

Some seem to believe that the Charter should simply be a political statement, albeit highly symbolic, but without any legal force.

The rapporteurs, Mr Duff and Mr Voggenhuber, on the other hand, have clearly indicated that they wish the Charter to have an unchallengeable legal force and the Committee on Foreign Affairs supports this point of view. Given the texts we already have in Europe (in particular the Council of Europe's European Convention on Human Rights) and the fact that the European Union is seeking to be the region where human rights standards are highest, it could hardly be content with a declaration that would not only fail to add anything to the existing provisions but would actually constitute a step backwards.

This leads us to another consideration, namely the connection between the Charter and the Treaties. In our view, the European Parliament should firmly advocate the incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties. At the very least, the principles of the Charter should be clearly set out in the Treaties, possibly by including the most detailed provisions in an annex.

3. As regards its actual substance, Committee on Foreign Affairs wishes to stress that the Charter should not compete or clash with legal instruments that are already binding on the Member States, e.g. the Council of Europe's European Convention on Human Rights and the European Social Charter. It would be most inappropriate, in terms of the Union's credibility, especially in the eyes of the rest of the world, for the EU Charter to have less legal force than existing instruments. It is also important to avoid the risk of introducing contradictions between the different texts. Such contradictions would not only create internal difficulties, but would also undermine Europe's message in the field of human rights.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs is therefore in favour of further consideration being given to the prospect of European Union accession to the European Convention on Human Rights, which would contribute to more unified standards and greater consistency in case-law. This would mean that, charter provisions on rights covered by the Convention would simply refer to the Convention.

4. As regards the categories of rights to be included in the Charter, our committee has considered the issue of minority rights or, to be more precise, the rights of persons belonging to minority groups. The draftsman considers that this issue is of such importance, especially in the applicant countries, that it would be inconceivable for the subject to be left out of the Charter. However, committee members are divided on this issue, some believing that the Charter should not deal with such a controversial matter.

5. Lastly, the future Charter, whether or not it takes the form of a legally binding commitment, will be part of the EU 'acquis'. The applicant countries must therefore be involved in the drafting of the Charter. Discussions with representatives of those countries should be held as a matter of urgency.

Moreover, the proposed instruments are so important in terms of consolidating the high level of human rights protection in Europe that it would seem inconceivable for the Council of Europe not to be involved, as an organisation, in the drafting of the Charter.

II. The Charter and the EU's external relations

In the many texts which call for a European Union Charter of fundamental rights to be drawn up, the question of links with the Union's external relations or, where appropriate, the CFSP, is scarcely mentioned. However, there are in fact interactions between them, which must be taken into account before adopting the Charter.

1. What can be the significance for third countries of a text adopted by and for the European Union?

First of all, we should note a rather remarkable feature of the European Union. Since Maastricht, the Treaty on European Union stipulates not only that the EU must respect human rights within its borders but also that one of the objectives of its foreign and security policy is 'to develop and consolidate democracy and the rule of law, and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms'. This is obviously a laudable objective and every effort must be made to achieve it. However, it is an unusual provision in the context of international relations which are traditionally based on power and influence rather than values.

In any case, in terms of standard international law, the European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights has absolutely no legal value in third countries! States are only bound by agreements which they have signed (or ratified). What is more, under the traditional rule of state sovereignty, countries have no right to pass judgement on the way in which other governments treat their own populations.

However, we are currently experiencing a period of change in which state sovereignty is increasingly being challenged in the name of principles deemed to be universal and the emergence of a right, or even a duty, of intervention.

Where the Charter simply refers to United Nations texts (United Nations Charter, Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the various protocols thereto, Declaration on Women's Rights, Declaration on the Rights of the Child, Declaration on the Rights of Migrant Workers, etc.), it will be possible to invoke such provisions even though, in practice, many signatory states show little respect for them.

However, where the European Charter goes beyond these texts – and this is likely to be often the case – it will be more difficult to enforce its provisions in third countries. This is already a problem in the absence of a European Union Charter. It will continue to be a problem after its adoption.

The objections of third countries are based not only on legal arguments (no legally binding texts) but also on cultural and philosophical grounds. These concern, in particular, the fundamental question of the universality of human rights, which is more difficult to deal with when seeking to enforce a text originally drawn up for a limited geographical area (European Union).

2. What are the means available to the European Union?

Direct intervention by the European Union is only possible on the basis of contractual clauses that are included in bilateral agreements with the relevant country. This is the case with regard to the clause on democracy and human rights which is now part of association, partnership and cooperation agreements. However, to ensure that such clauses are actually implemented, the Union is obliged to use indirect measures which can actually be applied even where there is no such clause. The democracy clause has therefore very little practical impact.

The European Union can resort to measures which are all forms of indirect pressure.

- Economic pressure

As a prosperous and powerful partner, the European Union can exert economic pressure. However, there are limits to what can be achieved in this area. First of all, economic sanctions tend to penalise poor populations more than their leaders, which is obviously not the aim of the exercise. The European Union may also have to deal with conflicting interests: applying an economic embargo may adversely affect EU exporters or investors. In this case, defending human rights clashes with defending one's own economic interests, which can create a difficult situation.

It is also important to mention humanitarian aid. Theoretically, such aid should not be made conditional upon respect for human rights in the recipient country. In actual practice, however, it can be used as an instrument by the country granting the aid just as it can be used for its own benefit by the government of the recipient country.

- Diplomatic and political pressure

The European Union institutions, and the European Parliament in particular, have often used such methods in different ways:

- adoption of resolutions and recommendations on human rights as part of the topical and urgent procedure;
- debates and hearings on the situation in specific countries or regions;
- pressure brought to bear during negotiations on bilateral agreements or treaties;
- pressure brought to bear during negotiations in international fora to draft multilateral texts or agreements;
- sending observers or mediators;
- the Council of Ministers may also decide to send official negotiators;

- threats of military intervention and military sanctions;
- use of force. Recent conflicts involving widespread violations of human rights in certain countries have shown the need for the use of force. However, they have also highlighted the serious problems this raises, including the obvious legal and political issues arising from intervention in a sovereign state.

3. Need for a general political framework to justify European Union human rights activities worldwide

There is therefore a danger that the European Union's action in support of human rights around the world may lead to a potentially chaotic proliferation of denunciations or interventions, thereby devaluing the notion of human rights and undermining the credibility of such action. The European Union is not an NGO. It is a political organisation which is expected to take political decisions and to show a sense of political responsibility. While it is extremely desirable for the EU to uphold the highest values, this is only possible subject to the following:

- First, a genuine common foreign and security policy which can define strategies vis-à-vis the Union's principal partners and promote coherent human rights action.
- A clear understanding of what fundamental rights we expect our partners to respect. This will not necessarily coincide with the content of the European Union Charter even though the latter may be used as a guide. This clarification is needed to ensure that the Union does not treat its partners differently and in a discriminatory manner according to its preferences.
- Information that is as accurate as possible on the human rights situation in the partner country. This implies that the Union should set up reliable means of investigation.
- Effective coordination between the three EU institutions (even though the European Parliament should continue to play a pioneering role) and within each of the institutions to avoid conflicting statements. The same applies to relations between the European Union, the Council of Europe and the OSCE. If they wish to defend human rights around the world, Europeans must seek to adopt positions that are as close and consistent as possible.
- The determination to avoid any temptation to adopt a post-colonialist or imperialistic attitude, in order to ensure that human rights action is never seen as being motivated by economic or power considerations.

CONCLUSIONS

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, Human Rights, Common Security and Defence Policy calls on the Committee on Constitutional Affairs, as the committee responsible, to incorporate the following paragraphs in its report:

1. Stresses that the adoption of the EU Charter must not in any way reduce the existing level of protection of human rights within the European Union;
2. Calls on the Member States in that connection to sign and ratify all Council of Europe conventions on human rights;
3. Urges all Member States to ensure that the Charter is given binding legal force, for example by incorporating it into the Treaty or in the form of an annex to the Treaty to which explicit reference is made in the body of the Treaty;
4. Considers that the Charter should apply to everyone in the European Union, and not be reserved exclusively for citizens, even though a section may be devoted to the rights specific to European citizenship;
5. Insists that the Charter should incorporate new concepts in the field of human rights, in response to the rapid pace of change in many fields of human endeavour in recent decades, most notably in relation to economic, social, technological, cultural and environmental factors;
6. Considers that a modern approach to fundamental rights also embraces the problems associated with the Internet, which require both internal regulation in the Union and, above all, Union initiatives at international level to promote financial regulation;
7. Recommends that the countries negotiating for accession to the European Union be associated with the drafting process, and proposes that hearings with representatives of the governments, parliaments, and the people of these countries be arranged as a matter of urgency, to enable them not only to adhere to the Charter, but also to apply it in their day-to-day affairs. Under no circumstances may association with the drafting process of a country negotiating for accession lead to negotiations for special treatment of that country in terms of the obligations and the level of human rights protection entailed by the Charter;
8. Reiterates its support for the accession of the European Union to the European Convention on Human Rights;

Délégation du Parlement Européen au sein de la Convention chargée de l'élaboration de la Charte des droits fondamentaux de l'Union Européenne

COMMUNICATION AUX MEMBRES

04/2000

Les membres de la délégation trouveront ci-après un résumé succinct des débats de la 6<sup>ème</sup> réunion de la délégation qui a eu lieu à Strasbourg le 14 mars 2000.

Monsieur MENDEZ DE VIGO, rendant compte du déjeuner du Bureau de la Convention le 7 mars à Paris avec le Ministre français des affaires européennes, a mentionné la nécessité d'avancer d'un mois la fin des travaux de la Convention, dans le but de pouvoir disposer d'un texte prêt dès la mi-octobre, pour le Conseil européen informel de Biarritz. Cette accélération a donné lieu à différentes appréciations de la part des membres, certains craignant qu'elle ne rende plus difficile la réunion du consensus nécessaire, d'autres soulignant qu'en revanche elle laisse plus favorablement augurer d'une incorporation de la Charte dans le Traité.

La méthode de travail de la Convention a suscité quelques questions, auxquelles M. MENDEZ DE VIGO a répondu que les membres étaient invités, en vue de la réunion plénière de la Convention des 20/21 mars 2000, à présenter avant le 17 mars 2000 leurs observations écrites sur la première série de droits soumis à l'examen de la Convention (articles 1 à 12 initialement, devenus 1 à 16, document CONVENT 13), sans préjudice bien entendu de leurs interventions orales au cours de la séance elle-même. Quant à la présentation éventuelle de la Charte en deux parties (partie A et partie B), M. MENDEZ DE VIGO a remarqué qu'elle équivalait à la méthode, adoptée d'emblée par le Présidium, de l'adjonction d'un commentaire juridique en italiques sous chaque article.

La difficulté de trouver un équilibre entre, d'une part, la nécessité que la Charte soit compréhensible pour le "simple citoyen", et, d'autre part, celle de tenir compte très précisément des dispositions de la CEDH (et de la jurisprudence que la Cour des droits de l'homme a élaborée sur la base de celle-ci) a fréquemment été relevée.

Sur le fond, les débats se sont concentrés sur la portée du droit à la vie, les implications des avancées scientifiques dans le contexte du respect de l'intégrité de l'être humain et de la liberté de la recherche, la définition de la famille et la gratuité de l'enseignement.

PARLEMENT EUROPÉEN

Délégation du Parlement européen au sein de la Convention chargée de l'élaboration de la Charte des droits fondamentaux de l'Union européenne

COMMUNICATION AUX MEMBRES

05/2000

Les membres de la délégation trouveront ci-après un résumé succinct des débats de la 7<sup>ème</sup> réunion de la délégation qui a eu lieu le 11 avril 2000.

M. MENDEZ DE VIGO a introduit la réunion en faisant le point sur le programme des travaux de la Convention, ainsi que sur leur calendrier prévisionnel : la Convention doit achever l'examen de la suite des droits sociaux et aborder celui des clauses horizontales ; un avant-projet de Charte devrait être adopté les 5/6 juin sur la base des amendements déposés par les membres de la Convention et d'un compromis présenté par le Praesidium ; quant à la poursuite ultérieure des travaux, la question du meilleur moment, pour le Parlement, pour prendre position sur la Charte constitue un point stratégique difficile à trancher, sur lequel il importe de réfléchir assez tôt ; des invitations en direction des ONG sont programmées (audition les 27/28 avril ; journées portes ouvertes le 6 juin) ; un colloque universitaire est envisagé d'ici à la fin du mois de juin ; enfin la Convention recevra les représentants d'Etats candidats le 20 juin.

Au cours du débat qui a suivi, des doutes se sont exprimés quant à la possibilité pour la Convention, compte tenu de l'absence de consensus en particulier sur les droits sociaux, de parvenir à un résultat dans un délai si bref ; à l'encontre de cette opinion, une charte a minima peut paraître inopportune, au regard notamment du mandat fixé à Cologne : la Charte, selon cette opinion, devrait en particulier expressément consacrer les droits sociaux et le droit à l'environnement.

Plusieurs voix ont mis en garde contre une expression trop précoce du Parlement sur la Charte, qui donnerait "trop" de temps au Conseil européen : novembre pourrait suffire.

La rédaction de l'exposé des motifs soulève certaines inquiétudes : il a été peu discuté ; et présente encore de nombreuses insuffisances. De plus il y a lieu de s'interroger sur l'éventuelle rédaction d'une partie pédagogique sur les compétences des institutions.

Tous ces débats, cependant, ne manquent-ils pas de réalisme, demande un membre ? Il convient en effet de ne pas oublier que le sort de la Charte dépend des Parlements nationaux et des gouvernements.

En ce qui concerne l'organisation d'un colloque universitaire, une décision rapide est désormais nécessaire ; de nombreux noms, au demeurant, peuvent être évoqués.

European Parliament Delegation to the Convention for the drawing up of a draft Charter of fundamental rights of the European Union

NOTICE TO MEMBERS

09/2000

Please find attached a summary of the discussions held at the 9th meeting of the delegation on 8 June 2000.

* * *

The chairman proposed that the delegation should consider the procedure for the provisional approval of articles in the Charter, in the light of, on the one hand, the very large number of amendments and, on the other, the pressure generated by the desire to produce a text approved by consensus in time for the Biarritz European Council.

As one member pointed out, a crucial point had been reached in the drawing up of the Charter, at which the divide between the two cultures within the Convention – the diplomatic and the parliamentary – had become patent.

Although it did embody a risk, the confrontation between these two cultures provided a precedent to illustrate the richness of the process involved in drawing up the Charter. There was therefore a compelling need to succeed so that the experiment might be used in future in other contexts. Early solutions were therefore needed to the problems which had recently held up progress.

The Convention therefore needed a real decision-making procedure; while a consensus could always be found when it was simply a question of negotiating a compromise between different expressions of the same approach, it became impossible when there were fundamental divergences on questions of principle. Could a vote really be avoided in such cases? It had to be realised that, failing that, the field was left to those who were monopolising debate as they did not want the Charter. In any case, as one member pointed out, while the conclusions of the Tampere European Council required the final adoption to be by consensus among the four parts, they in no way rule out simple majority voting on the articles.

Some members suggested that, if there were not to be a formal vote on each amendment, the authors of amendments falling completely outside the compromises tabled by the Presidium should have one minute's speaking time and should then have their amendments voted on. Mr Méndez de Vigo replied that that was precisely the procedure being considered by the Presidium.

One partial solution might be to give the chairman of the sitting formal authorisation to cut off any speech relating to a matter outside the terms of reference of the Convention or that had been dealt with in a previous debate. Debates might also be facilitated if the Presidium were to produce a summary of the amendments and an explanatory statement to justify the compromise being proposed.

After the meeting it was decided that Mr Méndez de Vigo should write on behalf of the delegation to the Chairman of the Convention describing these procedural proposals.

The delegation also touched on the question of what might be put forward at Feira, in view of the present state of progress. There could be no talk of a text. On the other hand, it would certainly be worth letting the Heads of State or Government know that the Convention was working, and working with a view to incorporation in the Treaty.

In reply to one member who appeared to cast doubt on the cohesion of the European Parliament delegation and hence its authority in its dealings with the representatives of the national governments, there were several references to the existence of a clear European Parliament position which could provide guidance for the members of the delegation.

ANNEX

DRAFT CHARTER OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS OF THE EUROPEAN UNION

PREAMBLE

The peoples of Europe, in creating an ever closer union among them, are resolved to share a peaceful future based on common values.

Conscious of its spiritual and moral heritage, the Union is founded on the indivisible, universal values of human dignity, freedom, equality and solidarity; it is based on the principles of democracy and the rule of law. It places the individual at the heart of its activities, by establishing the citizenship of the Union and by creating an area of freedom, security and justice.

The Union contributes to the preservation and to the development of these common values while respecting the diversity of the cultures and traditions of the peoples of Europe as well as the national identities of the Member States and the organisation of their public authorities at national, regional and local levels; it seeks to promote balanced and sustainable development and ensures free movement of persons, goods, services and capital, and the freedom of establishment.

To this end, it is necessary to strengthen the protection of fundamental rights in the light of changes in society, social progress and scientific and technological developments by making those rights more visible in a Charter.

This Charter reaffirms, with due regard for the powers and tasks of the Community and the Union and the principle of subsidiarity, the rights as they result, in particular, from the constitutional traditions and international obligations common to the Member States, the Treaty on European Union, the Community Treaties, the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the Social Charters adopted by the Community and by the Council of Europe and the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Communities and of the European Court of Human Rights.

Enjoyment of these rights entails responsibilities and duties with regard to other persons, to the human community and to future generations.

The Union therefore recognises the rights, freedoms and principles set out hereafter.

CHAPTER I – DIGNITY

Article 1

Human dignity

Human dignity is inviolable. It must be respected and protected.

Article 2

Right to life

1. Everyone has the right to life.
2. No one shall be condemned to the death penalty, or executed.

First informal working-party meeting of the Convention

entrusted with drawing up a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

Brussels, 24 and 25 February 2000

1. In accordance with its agenda, this first informal working-party meeting of the Convention considered an initial set of rights in the category of civil and political rights. A detailed discussion of these rights also broached the more general questions of how to use existing sources, present the results of work and structure debates by swiftly defining a complete though modifiable framework for all the work facing the Convention in the coming months.
2. The Convention decided, in line with the agreed timetable, to meet again as a working party on 2 and 3 March 2000.

Second informal meeting as a working party
of the Convention
to draw up a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

Brussels, 2 and 3 March 2000

1. The second informal meeting of the Convention as a working party provided an opportunity to continue the examination of rights falling under the category of civil and political rights. Accordingly, the working party dealt with the proposals for Articles 4 to 12, respectively covering:
  - a number of procedural rights;
  - respect for private and family life;
  - family life;
  - freedom of thought, conscience and religion;
  - freedom of expression;
  - right to education.

2. The examination led to proposals for amendments which will be embodied in a revised wording of these articles. At its next meeting - 7 March 2000 in Paris - the Praesidium will review a revised draft document before sending it to members with a view to a second reading.
  3. Alongside this meeting, the Praesidium held another meeting during which it heard the views of NGOs with an input into the Forum of Civil Society. It also clarified some conditions related to the internal functioning of the Convention, notably the time limit for interventions. The Convention, meeting as a working party, approved the conditions, with effect from that date.
  4. Winding up the meeting, the Chairman, Mr Roman HERZOG, invited members to reconvene at the plenary session on 20 and 21 March 2000 in Brussels.

Third plenary meeting of the Convention for the drawing up of a draft
Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

(Brussels, 20 and 21 March 2000)

1. During its third plenary meeting chaired by Mr MENDES de VIGO and Mr Gunnard JANSONN, the Convention held the second reading of certain civil and political rights as reformulated by the Praesidium to take account of the discussions held at informal meetings. That meeting enabled the first fifteen articles under this category of rights to be reviewed. The discussions were held on the basis of CHARTE 4149/00 CONVENT 13 and the list of written proposals for amendments sent to the Convention secretariat.
2. At the meeting, the Presidency announced that on 22 March the members of the Convention would receive electronically a new document recapitulating the proposed articles concerning citizens' rights. That document will be examined initially by the Convention's next meeting in the form of a working party on 27 and 28 March 2000.

3. At the next meeting, in addition to that initial examination, discussions will be resumed on Articles 13 to 19 (see CHARTE 4137/00 CONVENT 8) which will bring to a conclusion the first reading of all the civil and political rights. To allow the Convention sufficient time to cover its agenda, it has been decided that its proceedings will resume in the afternoon of 28 March at 14.15.
4. An important aspect of the Convention's timetable of work was highlighted at the beginning of the meeting by Mr MENDES de VIGO following the meeting on 7 March in Paris between the members of the Praesidium and the French Minister with responsibility for European Affairs. In view of the future Presidency of the Union, the need to terminate the proceedings in time for the informal European Council meeting in Biarritz was put forward. That deadline, combined with that of the European Council meeting in June 2000 under the Portuguese Presidency, at which the submission of a first preliminary draft of the complete text is planned, leads the Convention to abide strictly by its advance timetable.
5. At the end of its meeting, the Convention agreed to meet again in plenary session on 5 and 6 June 2000.

Fourth informal meeting as a working party of the Convention
to draw up a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

Brussels, 3 and 4 April 2000

1. At its fourth informal meeting as a working party, the Convention, chaired by Mr Gunnard JANSSON and then by Mr Inigo MENDES de VIGO tackled for the first time the issue of social rights on the basis of documents CHARTE 4192/00 CONVENT 18 and CHARTE 4193 CONVENT 19.
2. The Convention successfully concluded the first reading of eight of the twelve proposed texts for articles submitted by the Praesidium. Examination of the remaining articles together with the three texts proposed by the Commission (see CONVENT 19) was postponed until the next meeting.
3. Commenting on the revised provisional timetable for the Convention's discussions, the Chairman Mr Gunnard JANSSON said that the meetings normally reserved for further examination of social rights could, if necessary, be devoted to an examination of horizontal questions. He also confirmed the additional meeting scheduled for 8 May 2000.

Regarding the work of the Praesidium, he informed the Convention that it would be submitting a preliminary draft Charter for mid-May to give members time to submit written amendments. The June European Council would be given a progress report on the basis of this preliminary draft text as it stood following the Convention's examination. He also said that the Praesidium would shortly be submitting draft horizontal articles.

4. The Convention's next meeting as a working party will be held on 27 April 2000 and the first working day will be devoted to hearing the views of NGOs dealing with fundamental rights.

Fifth informal meeting as a working party of the Convention
to draw up a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights
of the European Union

(Brussels, 27 and 28 April 2000)

1. At its fifth informal meeting as a working party, the Convention, chaired by Mr Roman HERZOG, devoted its first working day to a public hearing of the NGOs representing civil society.
2. This hearing, which was in response to the wish expressed by the European Council in Cologne that all the bodies involved in preparing the draft Charter should give their views, was held in a climate of mutual receptivity which enabled the Convention to be directly apprised, by the organisations present, of the general or sectoral aspects deemed essential for the draft Charter under preparation. The 66 NGOs, all representative at European level and each of them grouping together in this capacity a series of associations, federations or other NGOs, having made a request to this effect, had an opportunity to present verbally the main points of positions which were very often expressed in greater detail in written documents that were either distributed in the meeting-room or had already been posted on the Convention's internet site.
A list of these NGOs is annexed to this communiqué.

3. On the second day the Convention began the examination of social rights, on the basis of CHARTE 4192/00 CONVENT 18, CHARTE 4193/00 CONVENT 19 and CHARTE 4227/00 CONVENT 26. This gave rise to a detailed discussion on the place that such rights should be given in the draft Charter and on the most appropriate way of including them. The Convention reviewed Articles 9 to 15 and XIII to XVIII as set out in the documents mentioned.

  4. At the end of the second working day, the Convention agreed to meet again on 3 and 4 May 2000 for another working session.

Sixth informal meeting, at Working Party level,
of the Convention
responsible for drawing up a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

(Brussels, 3 and 4 May 2000)

1. At its sixth informal meeting, at Working Party level, the Convention, chaired by Mr Roman HERZOG and Mr Gunnar JANSSON, addressed the horizontal clauses, on the basis of proposals for texts drawn up by the Praesidium (CHARTE 4235/00 CONVENT 27).
2. The Convention completed the first reading of the five proposals for the texts of Articles. However, the general discussion highlighted certain differences of opinion within the Convention. During the discussion, Mr Fischbach, in his capacity as the Council of Europe's observer at the Convention, took the floor at the invitation of the Presidency to talk about all the horizontal clauses under discussion. He agreed overall with the draft proposed.
3. The Presidency specified the future timetable for meetings and confirmed that, at that stage, all the scheduled meetings were due to go ahead. However, bearing in mind the need to make progress on the revised draft of the Articles that had already been examined by the Convention, it announced that the meeting on 11 and 12 May 2000 would begin only at 16.00 on the first day, to enable the Praesidium to meet for longer.
4. The next meeting of the Convention will therefore take place at Working Party level on 11 and 12 May 2000.

Fourth plenary meeting of the Convention to draw up a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights
of the European Union

(Brussels, 5 and 6 June 2000)

1. At its fourth plenary meeting, the Convention to draw up a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, chaired by Mr Roman HERZOG and Mr Inigo MENDES de VIGO, worked for the first time on a full version of the forthcoming draft Charter.
2. Work began with a reminder of the latest occurrences in Spain and a minute's silence in memory of the victims of terrorism.
3. The agenda of the meeting was divided into two parts. On 5 June 2000, the members of the Convention conducted a general debate on the question of social rights and the horizontal clauses, on the basis of CHARTE 4316/00 CONVENT 34. This discussion, which allowed positions to be clarified, certainly brought out some divergence among members regarding ways to include the social rights in the Charter, but also allowed the Praesidium to note that of the members who expressed a point of view, a fairly large majority supported its approach.

4. On 6 June 2000, the members of the Convention met with a programme to examine the 600 or so amendments submitted on the Articles concerning civil and political rights and the rights of citizens. These amendments were assembled and arranged in a master document with the reference CHARTE 4332/00. At its earlier meetings, the Praesidium had looked at each of these amendments and attempted wherever possible to formulate compromise amendments that would take account of the essence of the submissions formulated, with the twofold aim of lightening the workload of the Convention and approaching a possible consensual formulation while not depriving any members of the Convention of the right to bring up at a meeting any of the amendments filed. These compromise amendments were distributed the day before the meeting, with the reference 4333/00 CONVENT 36. The proposed procedure gave rise to a general discussion which led Chairman Roman Herzog to sketch, for the future, outlines for submission of amendments to the Convention to meet the objections raised.

5. In conclusion, the Chairman noted that the discussions that had taken place in the Convention proved above all that the Convention had reached a crucial stage in the accomplishment of its mandate. He announced that at its next meeting on 19 June 2000, the Convention would be meeting representatives of the countries applying for accession. On 20 June 2000, the meeting would continue according to the planned schedule and programme. That meeting would take place at the premises of the Council of Ministers.

Eighth informal meeting, in working group formation, of the Convention to draw up a draft
Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

1. At its eighth informal meeting, in working group formation, the Convention, chaired by Mr Gunnar JANSSON and Mr Inigo MENDES de VIGO, began proceedings by observing a minute's silence as a mark of deepest sympathy for the bereavement suffered by its Chairman, Mr Roman Herzog. Speaking on behalf of the Convention, Mr Gunnar JANSSON expressed the hope that, in its work, the Convention might continue to benefit from Mr Herzog's remarkable contribution to the draft Charter.
2. The Convention divided its work into two phases. Firstly, as provided for in the timetable, and pursuant to the brief given by the European Council, the Convention heard representatives of the countries which have applied for accession. Secondly, the next morning, the Convention continued to examine the amendments previously lodged to the draft Articles concerning civil and political rights, and citizens' rights.
3. The contributions of the representatives of the applicant countries made it clear to what extent the latter were aware of the issues on which debate in the Convention focused, and the considerable importance they attached to ensuring that they fully understood the texts being prepared. No differences regarding the substance or the objectives emerged during the discussion which followed the short statement by each national delegation. The open nature of the discussion was welcomed by both sides. The list of participants from the applicant countries is annexed.
4. On Tuesday 21 June, the Convention continued its work, concentrating on three major aspects:

Internet: <http://ue.eu.int/Newsroom>
E-mail: press.office@consilium.eu.int

- it resumed the discussions begun on 6 June on the amendments to the Articles on civil and political rights. It worked on the basis of CHARTE 4332/00 CONVENT 35 + ADD 1 + ADD 2 (compendium of all amendments lodged), CHARTE 4333/00 CONVENT 36 (compromise proposed by the Praesidium) and CHARTE 4360/00 CONVENT 37 (summary of amendments presented by the Praesidium). The discussions enabled progress to be made; the remainder of the Articles will be submitted to the next meeting of the Convention;
  - it heard an oral report by Mr Inigo MENDES de VIGO on the Feira European Council's discussions on the draft Charter. Mr Inigo MENDES de VIGO had had to replace Mr Roman Herzog, in view of the circumstances;
  - it adopted a new meeting timetable which took account of the need to allow enough discussion time to enable the work to be completed in time for the Biarritz European Council in October 2000.
5. The next meeting of the Convention would take place on 28, 29 and 30 June 2000 in working group formation.

Ninth informal meeting, in working group formation, of the Convention to draw up a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

(Brussels, 28, 29 and 30 June 2000)

1. At its ninth informal meeting, in working group formation, the Convention was chaired by Mr Gunnar JANSSON and Mr Inigo MENDES de VIGO.
2. The Convention divided its work into two phases:
  - Firstly, the Convention continued its second reading of the draft Articles on civil and political rights, starting with draft Article 9 (Presumption of innocence and right of defence) concluding with draft Article 22 (Equality and non-discrimination). The discussion was based on CHARTE 4284/1/00 REV 1 CONVENT 28, CHARTE 4333/00 CONVENT 36 (Compromise proposals made by the Praesidium) and CHARTE 4360/00 CONVENT 37 (summary of amendments presented by the Praesidium).
  - Secondly, the Convention inserted a discussion that had been much awaited by its members into its second day of work, on 29 June, on the horizontal clauses. This discussion, based on a meeting document (SN 3340/00) that had been prepared by the Praesidium and distributed at the meeting itself, mainly enabled the members to express their individual views on the substance of the clauses. The members all agreed that this was one of the most difficult and crucial subjects of the draft being drawn up. Mr Inigo MENDES de VIGO and Mr Braibant were asked to conclude this discussion. Mr Inigo MENDES de VIGO thought that the reactions had been positive and constructive, thus confirming that the large majority of members of the Convention shared a common objective.
3. The next meeting of the Convention will be held on 10 and 11 July 2000 in working group formation.

- held a thorough and fruitful discussion of the draft preamble. All the contributions illustrated how the Convention's work over recent months, despite the emergence of different options, has forged a common spirit and a common desire to complete this task. Discussion was based on a draft presented by the Praesidium (CHARTE 4400/00 CONVENT 43) and alternative versions drafted by some members; it also included consideration of a proposed overall structure for the draft Charter (CHARTE 4412/00 CONVENT 44). The Praesidium's proposals were accepted by a majority of members of the Convention as a basis to work on, subject to modifications, amendments and borrowings from the alternative versions which had been submitted.,
- finalised the timetable for forthcoming work and the procedure which it would use to consider the complete draft of the Charter as it emerged from its second reading.

In summary:

- the text resulting from the Praesidium's current work will be sent to members during the last week of July;
- members will have until 1 September to formulate their comments on the whole text and to hold consultations within their component groups with a view to the meetings in September, it being understood that from now on no further article-by-article discussion is planned;
- the Convention will meet again on 11 and 12 September 2000 to examine any action to be taken following consultations within its various component groups;
- on 26 and 27 September 2000, the Convention will be asked to give its agreement on a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, with a view to the meeting of the Biarritz European Council on 18 and 19 October 2000.

6. In conclusion, the Convention agreed to meet again on 11 and 12 September 2000 in Brussels.

3. On 13 September, instead of a plenary meeting of the Convention, the Praesidium met to establish this compromise thanks to a revised preliminary draft Charter. It will be distributed to Members as soon as possible.
  4. A further meeting of the Convention is scheduled for 25 and 26 September 2000 in order to finalise, both at the level of the component parts and in the plenary, this revised text, and to note that, in keeping with the terms used by the Tampere European Council, "the text of the draft Charter can eventually be subscribed to by all the parties". Under the terms of these same Conclusions, it is for the Chairperson, Mr Roman HERZOG, in close concert with the Vice-Chairpersons, to note that this is the case.

Sixth meeting of the Convention for the drawing up of a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

(Brussels, 25 and 26 September 2000)

1. At its sixth meeting, in accordance with its timetable, the Convention for the drawing up of a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union was scheduled to give its opinion on the draft Charter to be sent to the European Council. To that end, it agreed to proceed in two stages:
2. Firstly, during the afternoon of 25 September, the text of the preliminary draft Charter as set out in CHARTE 4470/00 CONVENT 47 (already distributed) was discussed by each of the component parts of the Convention, with its respective Vice-Chairperson in the chair. The Praesidium then met in order to reflect the wishes expressed by each of the component parts in a document intended to be consensual. The amendments thus made to CONVENT 47 were made available to Members on the morning of 26 September in the form of 4470/1 REV 1 ADD 1 CONVENT 47.
3. Secondly, on 26 September the Convention meeting in plenary, chaired in turn by Mr Gunnar JANSSON and Mr Inigo MENDES DE VIGO, held a general debate on the draft Charter thus amended, on which it then unanimously expressed its very broad agreement. In addition, it asked the Praesidium to forward the text to Mr Roman HERZOG, who was absent for health reasons, so that he could formally note the existence of the necessary consensus. The Convention accompanied its request with its most cordial wishes for a speedy recovery.
4. A further plenary meeting of the Convention is scheduled for 2 October 2000, in order to declare formally the existence of a consensus meeting the requirements set out in the mandate given by the Tampere European Council and the decision to present the consolidated text to the European Council to be held in Biarritz later that month.

Seventh plenary meeting of the Convention to draw up a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

(Brussels, 2 October 2000)

1. At its seventh plenary meeting, held on 2 October 2000, the Convention to draw up a draft Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, chaired by Mr Guy BRAIBANT, noted the agreement of its component parts to the draft Charter as set out in CHARTE 4487/00 CONVENT 50.
2. During this final meeting, the Convention listened to speeches by each of its Vice-Presidents, Mr Antonio VITTORINO, Mr Inigo MENDES de VIGO, Mr Gunnar JANSSON and Mr Guy BRAIBANT. Besides their support for the draft on behalf of the components chaired by them, the twelve key words used by Mr BRAIBANT to describe the text should also be remembered: originality, transparency, consultation and consensus, which he said were the salient features of the drafting process; and balance, dignity, liberty, equality, solidarity, citizenship, justice and horizontal clauses, the foundations supporting the draft. At the beginning of the meeting Mr Alber, President of the Court of Justice of the European Communities, also spoke as an observer, stating his support for the outcome of the Convention's deliberations.
3. Mr Inigo MENDES de VIGO then read the letter from Mr Roman HERZOG by which Mr HERZOG intends to announce to Mr Jacques CHIRAC, President of the European Council, that he is able to confirm in close collaboration with the members of the Praesidium that consensus has been achieved on the text mentioned above, meeting the requirements set out in the mandate from the Tampere European Council. The text will accordingly be submitted to Mr CHIRAC at the European Council in Biarritz in October 2000. Sustained and unanimous praise for Mr Roman HERZOG, who has unfortunately been prevented by health problems from attending the Convention in the last few weeks, followed.
4. At the end of their proceedings and before they parted, the members of the Convention once again listened together to the European hymn.

PRESIDENCY CONCLUSIONS

EUROPEAN COUNCIL MEETING IN LAEKEN

14 AND 15 DECEMBER 2001

Presidency conclusions - Laeken, 14 and 15 December 2001

---

1. Just when the European Union is introducing its single currency, its enlargement is becoming irreversible and it is initiating an important debate on its future, the European Council meeting in Laeken on 14 and 15 December 2001 has provided fresh impetus to increase the momentum of its integration.
2. The European Council's discussions were preceded by an exchange of views with the President of the European Parliament, Mrs Nicole Fontaine, on the principal items on the agenda.

I. THE FUTURE OF THE UNION

The Laeken declaration

3. Following the conclusions adopted in Nice, the European Council adopted the declaration set out in Annex I. That declaration and the prospects it opens mark a decisive step for the citizen towards a simpler Union, one that is stronger in the pursuit of its essential objectives and more present in the world. In order to ensure that preparation for the forthcoming Intergovernmental Conference is as broadly-based and transparent as possible, the European Council has decided to convene a Convention, with Mr V. Giscard d'Estaing as Chairman and Mr G. Amato and Mr J.L. Dehaene as Vice-Chairmen. All the candidate countries will take part in the Convention. In parallel with the proceedings of the Convention, a Forum will make it possible to give structure to and broaden the public debate on the future of the Union that has already begun.
4. In parallel with the proceedings of the Convention, a certain number of measures can already be taken without amending the Treaties. In this context, the European Council welcomes the Commission's white paper on governance and the Council Secretary-General's intention of submitting, before the European Council meeting in Barcelona, proposals for adapting the Council's structures and functioning to enlargement. The European Council will draw the operational conclusions from it at its meeting in Seville. Finally, the European Council welcomes the final report by the High-Level Advisory Group ("Mandelkern Group") on the quality of regulatory arrangements and the Commission communication on regulatory simplification, which should lead to a practical plan of action in the first half of 2002.

Transition to the euro

5. The introduction of euro notes and coins on 1 January 2002 will be the culmination of a historic process of decisive importance for the construction of Europe. Every measure has been taken to ensure that the physical introduction of the euro is a success. The use of the euro on international financial markets should be easier as a result. The euro area now represents a pole of stability for those countries participating in it by protecting them from speculation and financial turmoil. It is strengthening the internal market and contributing to the maintenance of healthy fundamental figures, fostering sustainable growth. The euro is also helping to bring the citizens of the Union closer together by giving visible, concrete expression to the European design. In that regard, the European Council welcomes the recent adoption by the Council and the European Parliament of a Regulation intended to reduce substantially the cost of cross-border payments in euro.

The European security and defence policy

6. The European Council has adopted the declaration on the operational capability of the European security and defence policy set out in Annex II, as well as the Presidency report. Through the continuing development of the ESDP, the strengthening of its capabilities, both civil and military, and the creation of appropriate structures within it and following the military and police Capability Improvement Conferences held in Brussels on 19 November 2001, the Union is now capable of conducting some crisis-management operations. The Union is determined to finalise swiftly arrangements with NATO. These will enhance the European Union's capabilities to carry out crisis-management operations over the whole range of Petersberg tasks. In the same way, the implementation of the Nice arrangements with the Union's partners will augment its means of conducting crisis-management operations. Development of the means and capabilities at its disposal will enable the Union progressively to take on more demanding operations.

Enlargement

7. The Commission document entitled "Making a success of enlargement", the regular reports and the revised partnerships for accession are a solid framework for the success of the accession process, which is now irreversible. The Berlin European Council established the financial framework permitting enlargement.

8. In recent months considerable progress has been made in the negotiations and certain delays have been made good. The European Union is determined to bring the accession negotiations with the candidate countries that are ready to a successful conclusion by the end of 2002, so that those countries can take part in the European Parliament elections in 2004 as members. Candidacies will continue to be assessed on their own merits, in accordance with the principle of differentiation. The European Council agrees with the report of the Commission, which considers that, if the present rate of progress of the negotiations and reforms in the candidate States is maintained, Cyprus, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Malta, Poland, the Slovak Republic, the Czech Republic and Slovenia could be ready. It appreciates the efforts made by Bulgaria and Romania and would encourage them to continue on that course. If those countries are to receive specific support, there must be a precise framework with a timetable and an appropriate roadmap, the objective being to open negotiations with those countries on all chapters in 2002.
9. The candidate countries must continue their efforts energetically, in particular to bring their administrative and judicial capabilities up to the required level. The Commission will submit a report on the implementation of the plan of action for strengthening institutions to the Seville European Council in June 2002.
10. The roadmap drawn up by the Nice European Council remains fully applicable. At the beginning of 2002 the Commission will propose common positions on the agriculture, regional policy and budgetary chapters on the basis of the present acquis and of the principles decided on in Berlin. Proceedings on the drafting of the accession treaties will begin in the first half of 2002.
11. The European Council welcomes the recent meetings between the leaders of the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities and would encourage them to continue their discussions with a view to an overall solution under the auspices of the United Nations consistent with the relevant resolutions of the United Nations Security Council.
12. Turkey has made progress towards complying with the political criteria established for accession, in particular through the recent amendment of its constitution. This has brought forward the prospect of the opening of accession negotiations with Turkey. Turkey is encouraged to continue its progress towards complying with both economic and political criteria, notably with regard to human rights. The pre-accession strategy for Turkey should mark a new stage in analysing its preparedness for alignment on the acquis.

II. THE UNION'S ACTION FOLLOWING THE ATTACKS IN THE USA ON 11 SEPTEMBER

The Union's action in Afghanistan

13. The European Council welcomes the signing in Bonn on 5 December of the agreement defining the provisional arrangements applicable in Afghanistan pending the re-establishment of permanent State institutions. It urges all Afghan groups to implement that agreement.

14. The European Council has undertaken to participate in the efforts of the international community with a view to restoring stability in Afghanistan on the basis of the outcome of the Bonn Conference and the relevant resolutions of the United Nations Security Council. In that context, it encourages the deployment of an international security force, which would be mandated, on the basis of a resolution of the United Nations Security Council, to contribute to the security of the Afghan and international administrations established in Kabul and the surrounding areas and to the establishment and training of new Afghan security and armed forces. The Member States of the Union are examining their contributions to such a force. The participation of the Member States of the Union in that international force will provide a strong signal of their resolve to better assume their crisis-management responsibilities and hence help stabilise Afghanistan.

15. The urgent needs of the Afghan people mean that humanitarian aid continues to be an absolute priority. The delivery of such aid, inter alia for refugees and displaced persons, must be adapted to changes in the situation and must take place in as efficient and well-coordinated a manner as possible. The Union has already pledged or is ready to pledge a total of EUR 360 million for humanitarian aid, of which EUR 106 million will come from the Community budget.

16. More than twenty years of war and political instability have destroyed the structures of Afghan society, completely disrupted the functioning of the public institutions and authorities and caused immense human suffering. The European Union will help the Afghan people and its new leaders rebuild the country and encourage as swift a return to democracy as possible. The situation of women will merit particular attention. Rehabilitation and reconstruction will require strong international cooperation and coordination. The European Union has appointed Mr Klaus-Peter Klaiber Special Representative in Afghanistan under the authority of the High Representative for the CFSP. On 21 December in Brussels, the Union will co-chair the first meeting of the steering group to support political renewal in Afghanistan and better coordinate donors' efforts with a view to the ministerial conference scheduled for January 2002 in Tokyo. At those meetings, the Union will undertake to help to cover the requirements, alongside the USA, the Arab countries and Japan, inter alia.

Combating terrorism

17. The European Union reaffirms its total solidarity with the American people and the international community in combating terrorism with full regard for individual rights and freedoms. The plan of action adopted on 21 September is being implemented in accordance with the timetable set. The progress which has been achieved indicates that the objectives will be met. Agreement on the European arrest warrant constitutes a decisive step forward. The common definition of terrorist crimes, the drawing up of lists of terrorists and terrorist organisations, groups and bodies, the cooperation between specialist services and the provisions concerning the freezing of assets which have been adopted following Resolution 1373 of the United Nations Security Council all constitute practical responses in the campaign against terrorism. The European Council invites the Council and the Commission to move swiftly towards finalising the programme to improve cooperation between Member States with regard to threats of the use of biological and chemical means; the work of the European Civil Protection Agency will provide the framework for such cooperation.
18. The European Union is committed to alleviating the consequences of the attacks of 11 September for the aviation sector with a view to ensuring a rapid and coordinated response from all Member States. The European Council welcomes the adoption of a common position of the Council on the Regulation on aviation security.

III. TRENDS IN THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL SPHERES AND IN SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT

General economic situation and prospects

19. The Union's economy is experiencing a period of slower growth and uncertainty under the combined impact of a global slowdown and a reduction in demand. Yet, present expectations are for a gradual recovery in the course of 2002. Disposable incomes are improving owing to diminishing inflation and tax cuts in several countries. Budgetary policy is geared to maintaining sound public finances. It has resulted in a reduction in long-term interest rates, which will help support demand. The progress already made in budgetary consolidation within the framework of the Stability and Growth Pact will enable budgetary policy to play a positive part in combating the slowdown with automatic stabilisers working while staying on the medium-term path of consolidation. Confidence must be based on the consistent implementation of the economic policy strategy as defined in the Broad Economic Policy Guidelines (BEPGs), the main axes of which are macroeconomic stability and structural reforms to enhance job creation and the Union's potential for growth. The European Council endorsed the report of the ECOFIN Council on the taxation of savings.

20. The European Council welcomes the outcome of the Ministerial Conference in Doha, which launched a new round of global trade negotiations based on an approach balanced equally between liberalisation and regulation, taking account of the interests of developing countries and promoting their capacity for development. The Union is determined to promote the social and environmental dimension of that round of negotiations.

The Lisbon strategy

21. At the Barcelona European Council on 15 and 16 March 2002 we will take stock of our progress towards the Lisbon strategic goal of becoming the most dynamic knowledge-based economy in the world, with full employment and increased levels of social cohesion, by 2010, and agree concrete steps on the priority actions we must take to deliver this strategy. The slowdown in growth makes it more important than ever to deliver the structural reforms agreed at Lisbon and Stockholm, and to demonstrate the continued relevance of our agenda for economic and social issues and sustainable development to Europe's citizens and businesses. We should use the structural indicators we have agreed to assess our progress and focus our activity. In order to give the European Council a full picture of the situation and to ensure that its decisions are coherent, the various preparatory processes will have to converge on the spring European Council.

22. Progress has been made following the Stockholm European Council on the various aspects of the Lisbon strategy. After thirty years of discussion, agreement has been reached on the European Company. There have been agreements on the liberalisation of postal services and on the package of Directives concerning telecommunications. The adoption of a series of economic and social structural indicators, including as regards quality in work and the fight against poverty and social exclusion as well as key indicators for sustainable development, will make it possible to see more clearly how each Member State is performing. The Commission will use them as a basis when drawing up its summary report to be submitted in January 2002.

Employment

23. The aim of the Lisbon strategy is to enable the Union to regain the conditions for full employment. We must accelerate our efforts to achieve by 2010 the 70% employment rate agreed in Lisbon. That must be the first objective of the European Employment Strategy. At the social summit on 13 December 2001 the social partners expressed their willingness to develop social dialogue by jointly drawing up a multiannual work programme before the European Council at the end of 2002. They also stressed the need to develop and improve coordination of tripartite consultation on the various aspects of the Lisbon strategy. It was agreed that a social affairs summit of this kind would in future be held before each spring European Council.

24. The European Council endorses the agreement reached in the Council concerning the 2002 employment guidelines, the individual recommendations to the Member States and the joint report on the employment situation. These decisions bear witness to the Union's desire, despite the world economic slowdown, to persist in its efforts to reform the structure of the labour market and continue to pursue its objectives concerning full employment and quality in work.

Fleshing out the European social model

25. In the field of social legislation, the European Council welcomes the political agreement between the Council and the European Parliament on the Directive on informing and consulting workers and the political agreement by the Council on a common position on the Directive on the protection of workers in the event of the insolvency of their employer. It stresses the importance of preventing and resolving social conflicts, and especially trans-national social conflicts, by means of voluntary mediation mechanisms concerning which the Commission is requested to submit a discussion paper.
26. The European Council welcomes the Council's conclusions and the joint Council and Commission report concerning services of general interest, which will be the subject of an assessment, at Community level, as to their performance and their effects on competition. The European Council encourages the Commission to set up a policy framework for State aid to undertakings entrusted with the provision of services of general interest.
27. The European Council notes with interest the consideration given to the principle of equality between men and women in the broad economic policy guidelines and in the Euro-Mediterranean partnership, and also the list of indicators of gender pay inequalities.
28. The first joint report on social inclusion and the establishment of a set of common indicators constitute important elements in the policy defined at Lisbon for eradicating poverty and promoting social inclusion, taking in health and housing. The European Council stresses the need to reinforce the statistical machinery and calls on the Commission gradually to involve the candidate countries in this process.

29. The European Council notes the political agreement on extending the coordination of social security systems to third-country nationals and calls on the Council to adopt the necessary provisions as soon as possible.
30. The European Council has noted the Joint Report on pensions drawn up by the Social Protection Committee and the Economic Policy Committee. The adequacy of pensions, the sustainability and modernisation of pension systems and the improvement of access to occupational pension schemes are all of particular importance for dealing with the increasing needs. The European Council calls on the Council to take a similar approach when preparing the report on health care and care for the elderly, in the light of the Commission communication. Particular attention will have to be given to the impact of European integration on Member States' health care systems.

Research and development

31. The Lisbon European Council drew attention to the importance of encouraging innovation, especially through the introduction of a Community patent, which should have been available at the end of 2001. The European Council asks the Internal Market Council to hold a meeting on 20 December 2001 in order to reach, in particular in the light of the Presidency document and of the other contributions of the Member States, agreement on a flexible instrument involving the least possible cost while complying with the principle of non-discrimination between Member States' undertakings and ensuring a high level of quality.
32. The European Council welcomes the adoption by the Council of a common position on the 6th Framework Programme for research and development, aimed at reinforcing the European Research Area.
33. The European Council reaffirms the strategic importance it attaches to the Galileo project and welcomes the decision of the European Space Agency taken in Edinburgh to grant finance to the amount of EUR 550 m. The European Council calls on the Council to continue its work with a view to taking a decision on the funding of the development phase by March 2002 and to decide on the Regulation by June 2002, taking account of the audit report by Price Waterhouse Coopers.

Sustainable development and quality of life

34. The European Council welcomes the adoption by the Council of the key environmental indicators which supplement the social and economic structural indicators with a view to the forthcoming summary report by the Commission. The European Council will assess – on this basis, and for the first time – the implementation of the Sustainable Development Strategy at its next meeting in the spring in Barcelona.
35. The European Council welcomes the outcome of the Marrakesh Conference on Climate Change. The Union is determined to honour its commitments under the Kyoto Protocol and confirms its desire that the Protocol should come into force before the Johannesburg World Summit on Sustainable Development, where the European Union intends to be represented at the highest political level.
36. The European Union has sought to respond to people's expectations regarding health, consumer protection, safety and quality of life. The European Council especially welcomes the setting up of the European Food Safety Authority, the European Air Safety Agency and the European Maritime Safety Agency. The Commission will very shortly be submitting a proposal for setting up a European Railway Safety Agency. The European Council notes the adoption of a number of texts seeking to increase consumer protection in the areas of product safety, indebtedness, the standards applicable to blood products and the prudent use of antimicrobial agents in human medicine.

IV. STRENGTHENING THE AREA OF FREEDOM, SECURITY AND JUSTICE

37. The European Council reaffirms its commitment to the policy guidelines and objectives defined at Tampere and notes that while some progress has been made, there is a need for new impetus and guidelines to make good delays in some areas. Holding Justice and Home Affairs sessions at shorter intervals will help speed work up. It is also important that decisions taken by the Union be transposed speedily into national legal systems and that conventions concluded since the Maastricht Treaty came into force be ratified as soon as possible.

A true common asylum and immigration policy

38. Despite some achievements such as the European Refugee Fund, the Eurodac Regulation and the Directive on temporary protection, progress has been slower and less substantial than expected. A new approach is therefore needed.
39. The European Council undertakes to adopt, on the basis of the Tampere conclusions and as soon as possible, a common policy on asylum and immigration, which will maintain the necessary balance between protection of refugees, in accordance with the principles of the 1951 Geneva Convention, the legitimate aspiration to a better life and the reception capacities of the Union and its Member States.
40. A true common asylum and immigration policy implies the establishment of the following instruments:
- the integration of the policy on migratory flows into the European Union's foreign policy. In particular, European readmission agreements must be concluded with the countries concerned on the basis of a new list of priorities and a clear action plan. The European Council calls for an action plan to be developed on the basis of the Commission communication on illegal immigration and the smuggling of human beings;
  - the development of a European system for exchanging information on asylum, migration and countries of origin; the implementation of Eurodac and a Regulation for the more efficient application of the Dublin Convention, with rapid and efficient procedures;
  - the establishment of common standards on procedures for asylum, reception and family reunification, including accelerated procedures where justified. These standards should take account of the need to offer help to asylum applicants;
  - the establishment of specific programmes to combat discrimination and racism.
41. The European Council asks the Commission to submit, by 30 April 2002 at the latest, amended proposals concerning asylum procedures, family reunification and the "Dublin II" Regulation. In addition, the Council is asked to expedite its proceedings on other drafts concerning reception standards, the definition of the term "refugee" and forms of subsidiary protection.

More effective control of external borders

42. Better management of the Union's external border controls will help in the fight against terrorism, illegal immigration networks and the traffic in human beings. The European Council asks the Council and the Commission to work out arrangements for cooperation between services responsible for external border control and to examine the conditions in which a mechanism or common services to control external borders could be created. It asks the Council and the Member States to take steps to set up a common visa identification system and to examine the possibility of setting up common consular offices.

Eurojust and judicial and police cooperation in criminal matters

43. The Decision setting up Eurojust and the setting up of the instruments needed for police cooperation – Europol, whose powers have been increased, the European Police College and the Police Chiefs Task Force – constitute significant progress. The Council is urged swiftly to examine the Commission Green Paper on the European Public Prosecutor, taking account of the diversity of legal systems and traditions. The European Council calls for a European network to encourage the training of magistrates to be set up swiftly; this will help develop trust between those involved in judicial cooperation.

Combating drug trafficking

44. The European Council notes the importance of intensifying the fight against drug trafficking and the urgency of adopting the Commission proposal on the subject by the end of May 2002. It reserves the right to take fresh initiatives in the light of the Commission's midterm report on the implementation of the European Union's Action Plan on Drugs.

Harmonisation of laws, mutual recognition of judgments and the European arrest warrant

45. The Framework Decision on combating trafficking in human beings, the European arrest warrant and the common definition of terrorist offences and of minimum sentences constitute important progress. Efforts to surmount the problems arising from differences between legal systems should continue, particularly by encouragement of recognition of judicial decisions, both civil and criminal. For example, the harmonisation of family law took a decisive step forward with the suspension of intermediate procedures for the recognition of certain judgements and especially for cross-border rights of access to children.

V. EXTERNAL RELATIONS*The Middle East

46. The European Council adopted the Declaration set out in Annex III.

The Western Balkans

47. The European Union has taken a full role in encouraging and assisting the countries of the region to continue their efforts in the framework of the Stabilisation and Association Process. The prospect of accession and the assistance provided by the European Union are key elements in promoting that process, respecting human rights, democratic principles and internationally recognised frontiers. The European Council welcomes the appointment of Dr Erhard Busek as Special Coordinator of the Stability Pact and thanks his predecessor, Mr Bodo Hombach, for his major contribution to the stability of the region.
48. The Union will continue to contribute to the recovery and stability of the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, particularly by insisting on full implementation of the Ohrid Agreement. The European Council welcomes the elections held in Kosovo on 17 November which launched the process of provisional self-government for the benefit of all communities and of stability in accordance with Resolution 1244 of the UN Security Council. It mandates the High Representative for the CFSP to encourage the dialogue between Belgrade and Podgorica with a view to reaching a negotiated solution for the status of a democratic Montenegro in a democratic Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

LAEKEN DECLARATION ON THE FUTURE OF THE EUROPEAN UNION

I. EUROPE AT A CROSSROADS

For centuries, peoples and states have taken up arms and waged war to win control of the European continent. The debilitating effects of two bloody wars and the weakening of Europe's position in the world brought a growing realisation that only peace and concerted action could make the dream of a strong, unified Europe come true. In order to banish once and for all the demons of the past, a start was made with a coal and steel community. Other economic activities, such as agriculture, were subsequently added in. A genuine single market was eventually established for goods, persons, services and capital, and a single currency was added in 1999. On 1 January 2002 the euro is to become a day-to-day reality for 300 million European citizens.

The European Union has thus gradually come into being. In the beginning, it was more of an economic and technical collaboration. Twenty years ago, with the first direct elections to the European Parliament, the Community's democratic legitimacy, which until then had lain with the Council alone, was considerably strengthened. Over the last ten years, construction of a political union has begun and cooperation been established on social policy, employment, asylum, immigration, police, justice, foreign policy and a common security and defence policy.

The European Union is a success story. For over half a century now, Europe has been at peace. Along with North America and Japan, the Union forms one of the three most prosperous parts of the world. As a result of mutual solidarity and fair distribution of the benefits of economic development, moreover, the standard of living in the Union's weaker regions has increased enormously and they have made good much of the disadvantage they were at.

Fifty years on, however, the Union stands at a crossroads, a defining moment in its existence. The unification of Europe is near. The Union is about to expand to bring in more than ten new Member States, predominantly Central and Eastern European, thereby finally closing one of the darkest chapters in European history: the Second World War and the ensuing artificial division of Europe. At long last, Europe is on its way to becoming one big family, without bloodshed, a real transformation clearly calling for a different approach from fifty years ago, when six countries first took the lead.

The democratic challenge facing Europe

At the same time, the Union faces twin challenges, one within and the other beyond its borders.

---

Within the Union, the European institutions must be brought closer to its citizens. Citizens undoubtedly support the Union's broad aims, but they do not always see a connection between those goals and the Union's everyday action. They want the European institutions to be less unwieldy and rigid and, above all, more efficient and open. Many also feel that the Union should involve itself more with their particular concerns, instead of intervening, in every detail, in matters by their nature better left to Member States' and regions' elected representatives. This is even perceived by some as a threat to their identity. More importantly, however, they feel that deals are all too often cut out of their sight and they want better democratic scrutiny.

Europe's new role in a globalised world

Beyond its borders, in turn, the European Union is confronted with a fast-changing, globalised world. Following the fall of the Berlin Wall, it looked briefly as though we would for a long while be living in a stable world order, free from conflict, founded upon human rights. Just a few years later, however, there is no such certainty. The eleventh of September has brought a rude awakening. The opposing forces have not gone away: religious fanaticism, ethnic nationalism, racism and terrorism are on the increase, and regional conflicts, poverty and underdevelopment still provide a constant seedbed for them.

What is Europe's role in this changed world? Does Europe not, now that it is finally unified, have a leading role to play in a new world order, that of a power able both to play a stabilising role worldwide and to point the way ahead for many countries and peoples? Europe as the continent of humane values, the Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights, the French Revolution and the fall of the Berlin Wall; the continent of liberty, solidarity and above all diversity, meaning respect for others' languages, cultures and traditions. The European Union's one boundary is democracy and human rights. The Union is open only to countries which uphold basic values such as free elections, respect for minorities and respect for the rule of law.

Now that the Cold War is over and we are living in a globalised, yet also highly fragmented world, Europe needs to shoulder its responsibilities in the governance of globalisation. The role it has to play is that of a power resolutely doing battle against all violence, all terror and all fanaticism, but which also does not turn a blind eye to the world's heartrending injustices. In short, a power wanting to change the course of world affairs in such a way as to benefit not just the rich countries but also the poorest. A power seeking to set globalisation within a moral framework, in other words to anchor it in solidarity and sustainable development.

The expectations of Europe's citizens

The image of a democratic and globally engaged Europe admirably matches citizens' wishes. There have been frequent public calls for a greater EU role in justice and security, action against cross-border crime, control of migration flows and reception of asylum seekers and refugees from far-flung war zones. Citizens also want results in the fields of employment and combating poverty and social exclusion, as well as in the field of economic and social cohesion. They want a common approach on environmental pollution, climate change and food safety, in short, all transnational issues which they instinctively sense can only be tackled by working together. Just as they also want to see Europe more involved in foreign affairs, security and defence, in other words, greater and better coordinated action to deal with trouble spots in and around Europe and in the rest of the world.

At the same time, citizens also feel that the Union is behaving too bureaucratically in numerous other areas. In coordinating the economic, financial and fiscal environment, the basic issue should continue to be proper operation of the internal market and the single currency, without this jeopardising Member States' individuality. National and regional differences frequently stem from history or tradition. They can be enriching. In other words, what citizens understand by "good governance" is opening up fresh opportunities, not imposing further red tape. What they expect is more results, better responses to practical issues and not a European superstate or European institutions inveigling their way into every nook and cranny of life.

In short, citizens are calling for a clear, open, effective, democratically controlled Community approach, developing a Europe which points the way ahead for the world. An approach that provides concrete results in terms of more jobs, better quality of life, less crime, decent education and better health care. There can be no doubt that this will require Europe to undergo renewal and reform.

II. CHALLENGES AND REFORMS IN A RENEWED UNION

The Union needs to become more democratic, more transparent and more efficient. It also has to resolve three basic challenges: how to bring citizens, and primarily the young, closer to the European design and the European institutions, how to organise politics and the European political area in an enlarged Union and how to develop the Union into a stabilising factor and a model in the new, multipolar world. In order to address them a number of specific questions need to be put.

A better division and definition of competence in the European Union

Citizens often hold expectations of the European Union that are not always fulfilled.

And vice versa – they sometimes have the impression that the Union takes on too much in areas where its involvement is not always essential. Thus the important thing is to clarify, simplify and adjust the division of competence between the Union and the Member States in the light of the new challenges facing the Union. This can lead both to restoring tasks to the Member States and to assigning new missions to the Union, or to the extension of existing powers, while constantly bearing in mind the equality of the Member States and their mutual solidarity.

A first series of questions that needs to be put concerns how the division of competence can be made more transparent. Can we thus make a clearer distinction between three types of competence: the exclusive competence of the Union, the competence of the Member States and the shared competence of the Union and the Member States? At what level is competence exercised in the most efficient way? How is the principle of subsidiarity to be applied here? And should we not make it clear that any powers not assigned by the Treaties to the Union fall within the exclusive sphere of competence of the Member States? And what would be the consequences of this?

The next series of questions should aim, within this new framework and while respecting the "acquis communautaire", to determine whether there needs to be any reorganisation of competence. How can citizens' expectations be taken as a guide here? What missions would this produce for the Union? And, vice versa, what tasks could better be left to the Member States? What amendments should be made to the Treaty on the various policies? How, for example, should a more coherent common foreign policy and defence policy be developed? Should the Petersberg tasks be updated? Do we want to adopt a more integrated approach to police and criminal law cooperation? How can economic-policy coordination be stepped up? How can we intensify cooperation in the field of social inclusion, the environment, health and food safety? But then, should not the day-to-day administration and implementation of the Union's policy be left more emphatically to the Member States and, where their constitutions so provide, to the regions? Should they not be provided with guarantees that their spheres of competence will not be affected?

Lastly, there is the question of how to ensure that a redefined division of competence does not lead to a creeping expansion of the competence of the Union or to encroachment upon the exclusive areas of competence of the Member States and, where there is provision for this, regions. How are we to ensure at the same time that the European dynamic does not come to a halt? In the future as well the Union must continue to be able to react to fresh challenges and developments and must be able to explore new policy areas. Should Articles 95 and 308 of the Treaty be reviewed for this purpose in the light of the "acquis jurisprudentiel"?

Simplification of the Union's instruments

Who does what is not the only important question; the nature of the Union's action and what instruments it should use are equally important. Successive amendments to the Treaty have on each occasion resulted in a proliferation of instruments, and directives have gradually evolved towards more and more detailed legislation. The key question is therefore whether the Union's various instruments should not be better defined and whether their number should not be reduced.

In other words, should a distinction be introduced between legislative and executive measures? Should the number of legislative instruments be reduced: directly applicable rules, framework legislation and non-enforceable instruments (opinions, recommendations, open coordination)? Is it or is it not desirable to have more frequent recourse to framework legislation, which affords the Member States more room for manoeuvre in achieving policy objectives? For which areas of competence are open coordination and mutual recognition the most appropriate instruments? Is the principle of proportionality to remain the point of departure?

More democracy, transparency and efficiency in the European Union

The European Union derives its legitimacy from the democratic values it projects, the aims it pursues and the powers and instruments it possesses. However, the European project also derives its legitimacy from democratic, transparent and efficient institutions. The national parliaments also contribute towards the legitimacy of the European project. The declaration on the future of the Union, annexed to the Treaty of Nice, stressed the need to examine their role in European integration. More generally, the question arises as to what initiatives we can take to develop a European public area.

---

The first question is thus how we can increase the democratic legitimacy and transparency of the present institutions, a question which is valid for the three institutions.

How can the authority and efficiency of the European Commission be enhanced? How should the President of the Commission be appointed: by the European Council, by the European Parliament or should he be directly elected by the citizens? Should the role of the European Parliament be strengthened? Should we extend the right of co-decision or not? Should the way in which we elect the members of the European Parliament be reviewed? Should a European electoral constituency be created, or should constituencies continue to be determined nationally? Can the two systems be combined? Should the role of the Council be strengthened? Should the Council act in the same manner in its legislative and its executive capacities? With a view to greater transparency, should the meetings of the Council, at least in its legislative capacity, be public? Should citizens have more access to Council documents? How, finally, should the balance and reciprocal control between the institutions be ensured?

A second question, which also relates to democratic legitimacy, involves the role of national parliaments. Should they be represented in a new institution, alongside the Council and the European Parliament? Should they have a role in areas of European action in which the European Parliament has no competence? Should they focus on the division of competence between Union and Member States, for example through preliminary checking of compliance with the principle of subsidiarity?

The third question concerns how we can improve the efficiency of decision-making and the workings of the institutions in a Union of some thirty Member States. How could the Union set its objectives and priorities more effectively and ensure better implementation? Is there a need for more decisions by a qualified majority? How is the co-decision procedure between the Council and the European Parliament to be simplified and speeded up? What of the six-monthly rotation of the Presidency of the Union? What is the future role of the European Parliament? What of the future role and structure of the various Council formations? How should the coherence of European foreign policy be enhanced? How is synergy between the High Representative and the competent Commissioner to be reinforced? Should the external representation of the Union in international fora be extended further?

Towards a Constitution for European citizens

The European Union currently has four Treaties. The objectives, powers and policy instruments of the Union are currently spread across those Treaties. If we are to have greater transparency, simplification is essential.

Four sets of questions arise in this connection. The first concerns simplifying the existing Treaties without changing their content. Should the distinction between the Union and the Communities be reviewed? What of the division into three pillars?

Questions then arise as to the possible reorganisation of the Treaties. Should a distinction be made between a basic treaty and the other treaty provisions? Should this distinction involve separating the texts? Could this lead to a distinction between the amendment and ratification procedures for the basic treaty and for the other treaty provisions?

Thought would also have to be given to whether the Charter of Fundamental Rights should be included in the basic treaty and to whether the European Community should accede to the European Convention on Human Rights.

The question ultimately arises as to whether this simplification and reorganisation might not lead in the long run to the adoption of a constitutional text in the Union. What might the basic features of such a constitution be? The values which the Union cherishes, the fundamental rights and obligations of its citizens, the relationship between Member States in the Union?

III. CONVENING OF A CONVENTION ON THE FUTURE OF EUROPE

In order to pave the way for the next Intergovernmental Conference as broadly and openly as possible, the European Council has decided to convene a Convention composed of the main parties involved in the debate on the future of the Union. In the light of the foregoing, it will be the task of that Convention to consider the key issues arising for the Union's future development and try to identify the various possible responses.

The European Council has appointed Mr V. Giscard d'Estaing as Chairman of the Convention and Mr G. Amato and Mr J.L. Dehaene as Vice-Chairmen.

Composition

In addition to its Chairman and Vice-Chairmen, the Convention will be composed of 15 representatives of the Heads of State or Government of the Member States (one from each Member State), 30 members of national parliaments (two from each Member State), 16 members of the European Parliament and two Commission representatives. The accession candidate countries will be fully involved in the Convention's proceedings. They will be represented in the same way as the current Member States (one government representative and two national parliament members) and will be able to take part in the proceedings without, however, being able to prevent any consensus which may emerge among the Member States.

The members of the Convention may only be replaced by alternate members if they are not present. The alternate members will be designated in the same way as full members.

The Praesidium of the Convention will be composed of the Convention Chairman and Vice-Chairmen and nine members drawn from the Convention (the representatives of all the governments holding the Council Presidency during the Convention, two national parliament representatives, two European Parliament representatives and two Commission representatives).

Three representatives of the Economic and Social Committee with three representatives of the European social partners; from the Committee of the Regions: six representatives (to be appointed by the Committee of the Regions from the regions, cities and regions with legislative powers), and the European Ombudsman will be invited to attend as observers. The Presidents of the Court of Justice and of the Court of Auditors may be invited by the Praesidium to address the Convention.

---

Length of proceedings

The Convention will hold its inaugural meeting on 1 March 2002, when it will appoint its Praesidium and adopt its rules of procedure. Proceedings will be completed after a year, that is to say in time for the Chairman of the Convention to present its outcome to the European Council.

Working methods

The Chairman will pave the way for the opening of the Convention's proceedings by drawing conclusions from the public debate. The Praesidium will serve to lend impetus and will provide the Convention with an initial working basis.

The Praesidium may consult Commission officials and experts of its choice on any technical aspect which it sees fit to look into. It may set up ad hoc working parties.

The Council will be kept informed of the progress of the Convention's proceedings. The Convention Chairman will give an oral progress report at each European Council meeting, thus enabling Heads of State or Government to give their views at the same time.

The Convention will meet in Brussels. The Convention's discussions and all official documents will be in the public domain. The Convention will work in the Union's eleven working languages.

Final document

The Convention will consider the various issues. It will draw up a final document which may comprise either different options, indicating the degree of support which they received, or recommendations if consensus is achieved.

Together with the outcome of national debates on the future of the Union, the final document will provide a starting point for discussions in the Intergovernmental Conference, which will take the ultimate decisions.

Forum

In order for the debate to be broadly based and involve all citizens, a Forum will be opened for organisations representing civil society (the social partners, the business world, non-governmental organisations, academia, etc.). It will take the form of a structured network of organisations receiving regular information on the Convention's proceedings. Their contributions will serve as input into the debate. Such organisations may be heard or consulted on specific topics in accordance with arrangements to be established by the Praesidium.

Opening of the plenary meeting

The Convention Chairman, Mr Valéry Giscard d'Estaing, opened the meeting, assisted by the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr Jean-Luc Dehaene and Mr Giuliano Amato.

I. General debate: "What do you expect of the European Union?"

Introduction. Mr Giscard d'Estaing opened the first substantive debate of the Convention by emphasising the size of the task at hand. He said that the citizens of Europe felt that their voice was not being heard on the future of Europe and that the first phase of the Convention should therefore be a listening phase.

He invited the members of the Convention to begin the debate. They were to speak freely and at a personal level, addressing first and foremost the other members of the Convention. The Chairman wanted the members of the Convention to identify what, in their view, should be Europe's priorities for the next twenty-five to fifty years.

Over eighty members of the Convention took part in the debate. The nature and the content of the contributions varied widely. Some members concentrated on a couple of priorities or even on just one. Others embraced the whole gamut of European affairs. Many contributions began with an analysis of the current situation within the Union. Notwithstanding the wealth and diversity of contributions, the following general themes recurred:

Assessment of the current situation. Very many members of the Convention commended the considerable progress made in the last fifty years, which had surpassed even the most optimistic forecasts conceivable at the outset. The results were taken for granted, especially the most important one, namely peace in Europe.

Among the successes of European integration, particular mention was made of the single market, the four freedoms (free movement of persons, goods, services and capital), the introduction of the euro for twelve Member States and the removal of controls on persons at borders within the Schengen area. Today, if Community nationals decided to leave one Member State to go and live in another, they did so by choice and because they had been afforded that opportunity, not because the move had been imposed upon them by fear or by force.

Many members of the Convention welcomed the enlargement process under way. Upon its completion, the scission of Europe in two, which had resulted from the Second World War, would disappear forever.

Nevertheless, many speakers also pointed to the weaknesses and shortcomings of present-day Europe. Europe did not listen to its citizens enough. Citizens did not feel they could hold to account those in positions of power who took decisions on Europe's behalf. The fact that the European Parliament was elected by universal suffrage, that the ministers sitting around the Council table represented their governments and that the European Commissioners were appointed by the Member States' governments and accountable to the European Parliament did not dispel the view that Europe was not democratic enough. Europe's citizens had to be directly able to choose and remove those at the helm of its affairs.

Public opinion often regarded the institutional mechanisms of the Union as laborious, complex and difficult to understand. Inside the Union, Europe was perceived as abstract and distant. Outside, it was perceived as not effective enough, failing, for instance, to respond rapidly and adequately to the challenges posed by globalisation and cross-border developments.

A number of speakers thought that Europe tended to be too prominent at the expense of the independence and freedom of nation states.

Expectations of Europe. A large number of Convention members thought that their fellow citizens expected greater involvement by Europe. Europe would have to be able to meet that expectation. Greater European presence was mentioned in the following areas in particular:

- an area of security and justice aimed, in particular, at enabling Europe to react to terrorist threats or migration pressure at its borders;
- European action on the international stage, enabling the Union to assume its full responsibilities and champion its values.

Others pointed to the need to build a credible and efficient economic and social nucleus and to step up coordination of fiscal and budgetary policies, especially between the twelve states sharing the same currency – the euro.

Defence policy, internal cohesion, food safety, the environment and solidarity with developing countries were also mentioned as areas in which Europe should play a greater role.

A number of members expressed a wish that the Union respect and protect the Member States' cultural identities. They wanted less European intervention and a willingness to scale down European action in certain fields. Reducing Europe's powers and limiting the acquis communautaire to areas where it could bring real added value would lend Europe greater legitimacy.

Principles which Europe must respect. All the members of the Convention stressed the shared values which unite our continent, citing inter alia democracy, the rule of law and the protection and promotion of human rights. Some mentioned the Charter of Fundamental Rights and asked that it be incorporated into the treaties. Others called on the Union to accede to the European Convention on Human Rights.

The theme of equality between Member States was mentioned several times, especially by the Convention members from the candidate countries. Each state, whatever its population, should feel at ease and respected in an enlarged Europe. Solidarity between Member States and the mechanisms underpinning it were also raised by a number of speakers.

The majority of Convention members called for a simpler division of powers and responsibilities, under which it would be clear to all what was the domain of the Union and what was covered at national, regional or even local level. The division of responsibilities should be one of the main topics to be addressed by the Convention. Europe's citizens were expecting clarity in this area above all.

A very large number of Convention members signalled their attachment to the principle of subsidiarity. They wanted effective arrangements put in place to ensure compliance with that principle.

A significant proportion of Convention members touched on the subject of democratic legitimacy and wanted the European Union to take account of citizens' expectations and give citizens a greater say in and fuller scrutiny of European decision-making. Transparency and accountability should improve the way Europe worked.

Institutional aspects. Some Convention members wanted the Union to have a treaty with constitutional status in some shape or form. A hierarchy of rules ought to be introduced. Several members reiterated their attachment to the Community method. Others emphasised the intergovernmental method. Tried and tested, it had shown that it worked. Extension of the qualified-majority rule and of the codecision procedure with the European Parliament was raised as well. Several members also referred to the role of the Presidency and the rotating Presidency system.

Convention. Several speakers addressed the work of the Convention itself. The vast majority stressed their determination to succeed in the task they had been given and warned their colleagues of the consequences if the Convention were to fail.

Some advocated that the Convention aim for a consensual text which could guarantee the success of the next intergovernmental conference (IGC).

Many Convention members stressed the importance of consulting civil society and, in particular, young people. Their proposals would have to be heard. A few members also wanted the churches to be given a hearing. One member proposed that a questionnaire be sent to every citizen, based on the model used in Switzerland for constitutional reforms.

II. Requests by representatives of the candidate countries

The Convention discussed the proposal presented by the Praesidium in response to the requests by the candidate countries at the inaugural meeting (CONV 10/2).

A few speakers wanted it amended so that two representatives (and not just one) from the candidate countries were invited to attend the Praesidium's proceedings as observers. Some representatives from the candidate countries also pressed for the right to be able to speak in their own language during the Convention's discussions.

The Chairman and some members of the Praesidium pointed out that not all Member States were represented within the Praesidium, nor should the candidate countries be as such. The possibility for Convention members from candidate countries to speak in their own language, at their request, would be re-examined at the technical level in consultation with the European Parliament.

The Chairman found that there was broad agreement on the proposals submitted to the Convention.

III. Working methods

The Convention held an exchange of views on the Praesidium's proposal on working methods (CONV 9/2).

The majority of speakers called for a flexible and pragmatic approach so that the Convention could quickly get down to the substance, given its limited time frame. Some speakers requested amendments. Others gave their agreement, while making a number of points.

The Chairman answered the questions raised, explained the reasons for the amendments made to the initial text and assured the members that the working methods would be applied flexibly, in a pragmatic manner and with an open mind. He also pointed out that a review procedure (Article 16) had been included in order to adapt working methods in future, should this prove necessary.

Winding up the discussions, the Chairman found a consensus within the Convention on the adoption of the working methods as they stood.

IV. Forum

Further to the note on the Forum (CONV 8/02), the recommendations of which were agreed to, Mr Dehaene mentioned the following points:

- the organisation of an online Internet chat with civil society would be considered;
- the open letter on the Convention and the Forum would be sent to the editors of the major European newspapers in the coming days;
- it was important to organise forums with civil society in the states represented within the Convention;
- the Economic and Social Committee would hold regular meetings with representatives of civil society after the meetings of the Convention; Mr Dehaene proposed that a member of the Praesidium and a member of the Secretariat be present at those meetings;
- a "Eurobarometer" of public opinion on the issues addressed by the Laeken Declaration, as proposed by a member of the Convention, would be worth carrying out.

The representative of the Committee of the Regions provided some information on the dialogue initiated with the regions on the issues being debated within the Convention.

V. Youth Convention

The Chairman recalled the proposal to hold a "Youth Convention", modelled on the Convention itself. He provided some explanations on the organisational aspects. The Youth Convention would be held in Brussels in July, either immediately before or immediately after the meeting of the Convention, scheduled for 11 and 12 July 2002. The Youth Convention would be organised along the same lines as the Convention. The young people should be briefed on the work initiated by their seniors. The members of the Convention would be responsible for choosing the young people, 168 being designated by Convention members from the Member States and the candidate countries, 32 by the European Parliament and 10 by the Commission. They would be aged between 18 and 25.

The Chairman stressed the importance of balanced representation as regards age, level of education, gender, etc. The Youth Convention would largely be funded by the Commission, with the support of the Secretariat and the European Parliament.

A note on the organisation of the Youth Convention would soon be sent to members of the Convention.

VI. Forthcoming meetings

The Chairman said that after this meeting, intended as a general discussion, the Convention should move on to more specific issues. The Praesidium proposed that the next two meetings focus on:

- Europe's tasks (what powers should be exercised at European level?);
- performance of those tasks (from the viewpoint of both democratic legitimacy and effectiveness).

In order to improve preparations for the first debate, members of the Convention would receive a document describing the current division of powers within the Union.

The hearing of civil society would take place after the meetings in April and May 2002 so that its representatives could state their views on those two main topics, having been briefed on the first Convention's initial discussions.

Subject : Note on the plenary meeting

I. Opening of the plenary meeting

The Convention Chairman, Mr Valéry Giscard d'Estaing, opened the meeting, assisted by the Vice-Chairman, Mr Giuliano Amato.

He congratulated Mr PETERLE for having been chosen by the representatives of the national parliaments of the applicant countries as a guest to the Praesidium.

He reminded members of the Convention that, as announced in CONV 18/02, the Praesidium had decided that members of the Convention from applicant countries could express themselves in their own languages. He explained the interpretation arrangements.

He pointed out to members of the Convention that in order to make for more lively debate, at the end of each set of five interventions according to the speakers' list, members could react by asking the Chairman of the meeting for the floor by raising a blue card. Those arrangements would be tried out as an experiment for one or two meetings, and their operation assessed thereafter.

The Chairman reminded the meeting that the Commission had distributed a note to the Convention which contained elements of the latest Eurobarometer regarding the future of the European Union. That note made very clear citizens' expectations of Europe.

II. General debate: the missions of the European Union

Introduction

Mr Giscard d'Estaing opened the debate by reminding the meeting that several documents dealing with this subject had been communicated to the Convention, on the one hand by members of the Convention, and on the other hand by the Praesidium, which had forwarded two documents: the first attempted to organise the debate by raising specific questions on the missions of the European Union (CONV 16/02) and the second (CONV 17/02) contained a description of how the competence of the European Union is made up.

Members of the Convention made 86 interventions.

First question: Scope of the missions of the Union

The first question for the Convention was whether, taking into account the new dimension of the Union, the present international environment, its present remit, and the aspirations of its citizens, the Union should be given more tasks and if so, what should be added, or on the contrary, it should be given fewer tasks, and if so which tasks should be given back to Member States?

1. General questions

A broad trend had emerged within the Convention on the need to avoid calling into question the present remit of the Union, with only two members wishing certain competences to be given back to Member States.

Certain speakers raised the difficulties of delimiting competence in terms of subjects and the need to establish instead a delimitation according to the intensity of the action according to areas by means of establishing policy instruments.

In this respect, several members stressed the need to consider the question of the Union's missions together with the question of the division of competences and instruments. To that end, a desire was expressed for the Treaty to indicate clearly who did what by indicating the degree of Union competence for each policy.

Several members wanted the three-pillar structure to be replaced by a single institutional structure.

2. The Union's missions which received the support of a large number of speakers

The majority of speakers mentioned the need to strengthen the Union's missions in two areas while conferring on it the necessary competences to carry out those missions:

- The common foreign policy, in order to enhance the presence and action of the Union on the international scene, particularly in crisis management. The Union should be capable of reacting effectively to the new challenges of international politics.
- The liberty, security and justice policy to enable the Union to act more effectively, in particular against terrorism, organised crime, illegal immigration, drugs and trafficking in human beings. In this context, certain members called for the introduction of a common border protection service.

Many members also wanted:

- an economic government as a corollary of Monetary Union,
- a reference to human rights by inserting the Fundamental Rights Charter into the Treaties. The question of the Union having a legal personality and its accession to the European Convention on Human Rights was raised,
- a link between external policy and development aid policy.

3. Other missions of the Union mentioned

Certain members wanted the Union also to take more action in the following areas:

- the environment,
- research and innovation,
- food security,
- security of supply.

4. Missions on which differences emerged

Several members called for European action in the following areas:

- economic and social cohesion and the development of a European social model, requiring a European social treaty taking into account the differences between Member States,
- combating poverty and social exclusion,
- combating unemployment, and certain members wanted the Union to have its own tax arrangements. Other speakers considered that unnecessary.

As regards education, vocational training and teaching, some members called for the implementation of a European education system, whereas others wanted those issues to fall within the competence of Member States.

5. Member States' missions

As regards missions that should continue to be the responsibility of Member States, the majority of speakers who touched on the question referred to the following areas:

- the internal organisation of Member States,
- public services,
- culture,
- social security.

Some of those speakers pointed out that these were examples and not a complete list.

However, it was observed that the fact that the Union did not intervene directly in those areas should not prevent it from encouraging cooperation between Member States in those areas and/or supporting the coordination of the action of Member States.

Second question: The criteria used for deciding which missions should be carried out at Union level

The second question for the Convention was to determine the criteria used to decide which missions should be carried out at Union level and the principles on which the Convention should base such decisions.

The aspirations of citizens should, according to the members of the Convention, inform the division of competence between the Union and Member States.

A large majority of speakers reminded the meeting of the following criteria:

- the criterion of subsidiarity: the Union should only take action in the areas where it alone could do so given the cross-border elements of the action, or in areas where the Union could act more effectively than Member States individually. Certain speakers stressed the need to reinforce the application of the principle of subsidiarity;
- the criterion of proportionality: any action by the Union should not go beyond what was necessary to achieve the objectives pursued.

Certain speakers also mentioned the solidarity principle.

Third question: Member States' competence

The third question for the Convention aimed in particular to ascertain whether the Treaties should explicitly decide that responsibilities not covered by the missions of the Union should remain with Member States or whether they should be spelt out in the Treaties and, if that is the case, on the basis of what criteria. It was also asked what the principles should be on which the Convention might base such a decision.

Most speakers stressed the need to clarify in the Treaties the principle whereby missions not allocated to the Union by the Treaties continue to be the responsibility of Member States, but without drawing up in the Treaty an enumerative list of Member States' competence. The majority of the members of the Convention considered that drawing up such a list would risk setting in stone Member States' competence and be detrimental to the requisite flexibility to adapt to new realities. Certain speakers pointed out that given that competence remained under Member States except where allocated to the Union, it was difficult to draw up an enumerative list of Member States' competence.

Fourth question: Evolution of competence

The final question for the Convention was whether the missions of the Union should be settled now, for all time, or whether the possibility of further evolution should be foreseen.

Flexibility of the system for the delimitation of competence

The large majority of speakers supported a flexible system for the delimitation of competence allowing for some adaptation of the Union's missions to the new challenges and for citizens' expectations to be met optimally. Several speakers indicated that in this respect, the flexibility and dynamism at the heart of the Union's past development, and which was one of its strong points, should be preserved. A system of lists, whether of the competence of the Union or of Member States, would run counter to that flexibility. In that respect, it was pointed out by way of example that it was the current flexibility that enabled the Community to deal with problems relating to asylum and to adopt the Directive on electronic commerce.

Certain speakers emphasised the importance of having clear and democratic decision-making principles rather than a rigid system for the delimitation of competence. The need to preserve Article 95 and Article 308 of the TEC was also mentioned in this context.

Checks to ensure compliance with the principle of delimitation of competence and the subsidiarity principle

According to the large majority of speakers, the flexible system of delimitation should be accompanied by the implementation of effective means of checking compliance with the principle of delimitation of competence and the subsidiarity principle, as they considered that controlling the effective application of those principles was the best guarantee of their compliance. For most speakers, those controls should imply the participation of national parliaments. In this context it was pointed out that national Parliaments could already check compliance with the principle of delimitation of competence and the subsidiarity principle in certain areas insofar as there were debates on those matters at national level.

There was a discussion on whether the controls should include a new mechanism and whether such a mechanism should be political or judicial. Most speakers were in favour of an a priori or a posteriori mechanism composed of representatives of national parliaments, some being in favour of including representatives of the European Parliament. Certain speakers supported a judicial mechanism, putting forward the idea of a court composed of members of national constitutional courts or of a mechanism of cooperation between the Court of Justice and national constitutional courts.

Some speakers supported the participation of the regions in such a control, in particular those with legislative powers, while indicating that the allocation of competence between federal States and their federated entities should continue to be organised by the Member States concerned.

Finally, the need to establish varying arrangements for the amendments of the Treaties was mentioned: more rigid arrangements for the basic provisions and more flexible arrangements for the others.

III. Youth Session of the Convention

The Convention approved the document presented to it containing proposals for the organisation of a "Convention for the Young People of Europe" on the model of the Convention itself (CONV 15/02).

In discussing the document, more in-depth consideration was given to a number of problems, in particular the selection procedure for young people participating in the Convention. Several speakers stressed the need to establish transparent and objective selection procedures and to have a balance in the representation of the various sectors of society and the various viewpoints on European integration.

The Chairman stressed that the chosen selection procedure guaranteed such a balance and that the debate between the young people should be as free as possible. As regards the organisation of the debate within the Youth Convention, he indicated that there would be a Praesidium and a rapporteur appointed by the "Youth Convention" and that the rapporteur would report to the Convention. The question of establishing contact with the young people after the Youth Convention was over should be examined at a later stage.

IV. Other business

Setting up working parties

As regards the requests by members of the Convention for working parties to be set up as soon as possible, the Chairman of the meeting pointed out that the Praesidium was currently considering the matter and in particular was giving thought to topics that might usefully be examined by such working parties.

The next session

Winding up, Chairman said that the session of the Convention on 23 and 24 May 2002 would be devoted to the execution of the European Union's missions in the light of both legitimacy and efficiency. The session would consider in depth the matter of Union competence and the instruments to implement it.

THE EUROPEAN CONVENTION

Brussels, 6 May 2002

THE SECRETARIAT

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS

Subject: Meeting of the Praesidium
Brussels, 25 April 2002

I. POINTS SETTLED1. Autumn calendar

The Praesidium, taking into account both the wish of members designated by national parliaments to have Convention sessions on Monday and Tuesday and the need underlined by the other members of having sufficient time for prior co-ordination meetings of components and political groups, reached agreement on the attached calendar.

2. Handling of Plenary sessions

It was agreed that the introduction of blue card interventions at the April session had worked well. Further to increase the spontaneity of debate ,speakers whose contributions had been the subject of blue card comments should in future be given a (green card) right of brief reply.

II. OUTSTANDING ISSUES3. Working groups

The Praesidium considered the Secretariat document SN 2103/2/02 REV 2.

Following an exchange of views, in particular on the scope of the mandate of the working groups and on suggestions for the setting up of other working groups, the Chairman concluded that at the May session the Praesidium would announce the setting up of 6 working groups. Five of them would correspond to those suggested in the above mentioned paper, with slight amendments to their mandate, and a sixth one would consider improved economic co-ordination mechanisms in the context of monetary union. The Praesidium agreed to finalise the mandate of the 6 working groups at its next meeting on the basis of a new Secretariat draft.

As to the idea, put forward by the "invitee", of a working group on minorities and cultural identities, it was concluded that rather than creating a specific working group, these questions could be dealt with in the working groups on the "Charter" and on "Complementary competences".

As to the Presidency on the working groups, the Praesidium agreed the following :

- Subsidiarity : Ms Palacio
- Charter : Mendez de Vigo or Vitorino
- Legal personality : Amato
- National parliaments : Stuart or Bruton
- Complementary competences : Christophersen
- Economic governance : Hänsch.

It was further agreed that each working group Chairman would prepare for the Praesidium a short paper describing the approach to be followed in the group.

Topics for other working groups, notably in the field of foreign policy and JAI, would be identified following the debate in the plenary in June.

4. The Forum and the Convention session devoted to civil society

On the basis of the note by the Vice-Chairman Dehaene and of its oral presentation, the Praesidium took stock of the activities carried out within the Forum and was informed about the modalities for the June session devoted to civil society. It was agreed that the designated Convention Observers have a specific position in relation to the dialogue with civil society and would therefore be given the possibility to address the Convention. Vice-Chairman Dehaene also referred to the meetings of NGOs and other organisation representing civil society organised by ECOSOC, which could also allow participants to identify spokesmen to address the Convention.

The Praesidium stressed the need to ensure that the session devoted to civil society be lively and interesting. It was agreed that the members of the Convention could intervene in the debate with the blue card.

4. Consultation of students on the future of Europe

The Praesidium noted with interest the proposal put forward by four members of the Convention.

The next Praesidium Meeting will take place on 8 May, at 10h30.

THE EUROPEAN CONVENTION

Brussels, 8 May 2002

THE SECRETARIAT

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS

Subject: Meeting of the Praesidium
Brussels, 8 May 2002

I. POINTS SETTLED*1. Convention session of 23-24 May

The Praesidium agreed that two papers would be forwarded to the Convention with a view to preparing the debate : one on "Competences" (new expanded version of the CONV 17/02, taking into account elements emerging from the April session), and a second one on "Instruments" (the Secretariat draft, amended on the basis of the Praesidium discussion).

The paper on National Parliaments would need further elaboration and would then be circulated later.

2. Convention session devoted to civil society

In order to allow for more time for preparation, the session devoted to civil society would be the entire second session of June (24-25.06.02). The Praesidium agreed that the session would be organised according to the modalities set out in the Secretary General's paper dated 7 May. It decided however to add a seventh contact group on culture. The contact groups would be chaired as follows :

|                              |                      |
|------------------------------|----------------------|
| Social                       | Mr Hänsch            |
| Environmental                | Ms Katiforis         |
| Human Rights                 | Mr Vitorino          |
| Development                  | Mr Christophersen    |
| Academia                     | Vice-President Amato |
| Regional/Sub-Regional groups | Ms Palacio           |
| Culture                      | Mr Peterle           |

One or two other members of the Convention would be invited to play a part; all the other members would of course be welcome to attend these hearings.

3. Working groups

The Praesidium agreed the mandate of the six working groups (attached). As to the presidency and to the deadlines, it agreed the following :

- Subsidiarity : Mendez de Vigo (September)
- Charter : Vitorino (November)
- Legal personality : Amato (November)
- National parliaments : Stuart (November)
- Complementary competences : Christophersen (October)
- Economic governance : Hänsch (October).

This information would be given to the Convention on 23 May. The working groups would be established on 6-7 June. The Secretariat would issue a document containing the mandates, specifying the deadlines and indicating how members of the Convention could volunteer. They could indicate in order of priority their (two or three) preferences for working groups in order to allow the Praesidium to decide of the composition of each working group, with a view to achieving a balance between the different components and nationalities.

The Praesidium was informed of the names of the members of the Secretariat who will assist the working groups :

- Subsidiarity : Arpio (02-285.6183), De Poncins (02-285.5112)
- Charter: Ladenburger (02-285.5057), Bartol (02-285.6694)
- Legal personality : Passos (02-285.5049), Bribosia (02-285.5047)
- National Parliaments : van den Heuvel (02-285.8503), de Peyron (02-285.9816)
- Complementary competences : Martinez (02-285.5061), Schiavo (02-285.5972)
- Economic governance : Pilette (02-285.8989), Milton (02-285.8519).

The Chairpersons of the working groups will prepare, with their assistance, the papers aimed at introducing the debate in the working groups.

The Praesidium agreed that other working groups (notably on foreign and defence policy and JAI) would be set up in July.

4. The note of the Secretariat on "Contributions" was endorsed, and the Budget report noted.

II. OUTSTANDING ISSUES

5. Note on the missions of the Union by Mr Katiforis

The Praesidium had a first exchange of views on this note, for which the President thanked Mr Katiforis.

6. Consultation of students on the future of Europe

This proposal will be discussed at a future meeting of the Praesidium.

Subject: Working Groups

1. As discussion has begun within the Convention on matters of substance, the need has emerged to set up working groups to meet the twin aims of investigating a number of specific questions in greater depth and involving the members of the Convention in fundamental work which cannot be done in plenary session.
2. Article 15 of the Working Methods lays down that:
"In the light of views expressed in the Convention, the Chairman or a significant number of the members of the Convention may recommend that the Praesidium set up Convention Working Groups. The Praesidium will determine their mandate, working arrangements and composition, taking into account the specific expertise of members, alternates and observers in relation to the subject under discussion. Every member of the Convention may attend all such meetings. The Secretariat establishes a summary note after each meeting of the working groups."

3. The discussion in plenary meeting, in particular that of 15 and 16 April, yielded a number of indications in the light of which the Chairman recommended to the Praesidium that working groups should be set up. The Praesidium has agreed to set up six working groups at this stage with the following mandates:

- Group 1: How can verification of compliance with the principle of subsidiarity be ensured? Should a verification mechanism or procedure be introduced? Should such a procedure be political and/or judicial in character?
- Group 2: If it is decided to include the Charter of Fundamental Rights in the Treaty: how should this be done, and what would be the consequences thereof? What would the consequences be of accession by the Community/Union to the European Convention on Human Rights?
- Group 3: What would the consequences be of explicit recognition of the legal personality of the EU, and of a fusion of the legal personalities of the EU and the European Community? Might they contribute to simplification of the Treaties?
- Group 4: How is the role of national Parliaments carried out in the present architecture of the European Union? What are the national arrangements which function best? Should new mechanisms/procedures be envisaged at national or European level?
- Group 5: How should "complementary" competence be treated in future? Should Member States be accorded full competence for matters in which the Union at present has complementary competence, or should the limits of the Union's complementary competence be spelled out?
- Group 6: The introduction of the single currency implies closer economic and financial cooperation. What forms might such cooperation take?

4. Concerning the chairmanship of the working groups, the deadline by which each group should reach conclusions to be submitted to the plenary session and the assistance provided by the Secretariat to the working groups' chairmen, the following has been decided. The deadlines set are intended to give further substance to the plenary meetings of the Convention scheduled for September, October and November. For this reason the deadlines differ as shown:

|          |              |                           |
|----------|--------------|---------------------------|
| Group 1: | Chairman:    | Mendez de Vigo            |
|          | Deadline:    | September                 |
|          | Secretariat: | Arpio, De Poncins         |
| Group 2: | Chairman:    | Vitorino                  |
|          | Deadline:    | November                  |
|          | Secretariat: | Ladenburger, Bartol       |
| Group 3: | Chairman:    | Amato                     |
|          | Deadline:    | November                  |
|          | Secretariat: | Passos, Bribosia          |
| Group 4: | Chairman:    | Stuart                    |
|          | Deadline:    | September                 |
|          | Secretariat: | van den Heuvel, de Peyron |
| Group 5: | Chairman:    | Christophersen            |
|          | Deadline:    | October                   |
|          | Secretariat: | Martinez, Schiavo         |
| Group 6: | Chairman:    | Hänsch                    |
|          | Deadline:    | October                   |
|          | Secretariat: | Pilette, Milton           |

5. For the working groups to work effectively, the number of their members should ideally be about 20 to 25, to allow for representation of the different constituent elements and for the fact that any other member of the Convention may attend meetings as laid down in Article 15 of the Working Methods.
6. The guiding criterion for the composition of the working groups, in accordance with Article 15 of the Working Methods, is that of specific expertise, and that criterion applies to members, alternates and observers.

The Praesidium invites Convention members, alternates and observers to express their interest in taking part in any of the working groups, listing them in order of preference where interested in more than one group. This information must be communicated to the Convention Secretariat by Thursday 30 May 2002, for the attention of Ms Martinez Iglesias:

e-mail: maria-jose.martinez-iglesias@consilium.eu.int

Fax: + 32 2 285 5060

7. The composition of the working groups will be determined by the Praesidium on the above basis in order to ensure the necessary balance between constituent elements, and the working groups will be formally established at the plenary meeting on 6 June 2002.

Working Group II: "Charter/ECHR"

Chairman: António Vitorino

If it is decided to incorporate the Charter of Fundamental Rights in the Treaty: how should this be done and what would be the consequences? What would be the implications of accession by the Community/Union to the European Convention on Human Rights?

Introduction

The purpose of this note is to give an initial summary of the substantive questions which should be dealt with by the Working Group on "Incorporation of the Charter/Accession to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR)". On the basis of this summary, I shall in due course put forward a detailed analysis of the questions mentioned in order to guide discussions within the Working Group.

There are two aspects to the Working Group's mandate:

- The procedures for and consequences of any incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties
- The consequences of any accession by the Community/Union to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).

These aspects need to be addressed by the Working Group separately and in turn. I wish to state from the outset that the two aspects are complementary and not alternatives, since incorporation of the Charter in no way lessens the importance of any accession to the ECHR or vice versa.

Finally, in the case of both aspects, one point should be borne in mind regarding discussion in the Working Group: as it is the general wisdom that working groups should concentrate on more targeted matters and not duplicate the political debates of plenary meetings, the Working Group should not get involved in discussion of the major political questions (whether the Charter should be incorporated or whether there should be accession to the ECHR). It should rather focus on examining the more specific matters outlined below, on the assumption that the two questions will meet with a positive political response.

I. Procedures for and consequences of any incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties

1. Preliminary remark: the content of the Charter as an *acquis

In my view, a wise initial position would be that the content of the Charter as negotiated by the earlier Convention constitutes a common acquis which should be maintained.

However, should the Convention advocate changing the current structure or designation of the Treaties, it might prove necessary to make certain adjustments to the Charter of a purely drafting nature or to hold a discussion on maintaining Article 52(2)<sup>1</sup> of the Charter if the Convention wished to establish a hierarchical distinction between a new basic Treaty and the rest of existing primary law.

2. Examination of possible techniques for incorporation and certain related questions

One of the Working Group's key tasks will be to examine the various possible techniques for incorporating the Charter (incorporation of the Charter's articles into the EU Treaty or a new basic Treaty, Protocol annexed thereto, reference in an article such as the present Article 6(2) of the TEU, etc.). That examination will have to consider various aspects such as the precise legal effect and the political profile which are to be conferred on the Charter. It will also have to consider the general question of the future structure of the Treaties. The Working Group will also have to look at certain questions relating to the technique of incorporation, in particular what is to happen to the preamble to the Charter, whether to keep a reference – of the kind currently in Article 6(2) of the TEU – to common constitutional traditions and the ECHR – and the relationship between some of the Charter's articles and the provisions of the present EC Treaty which they repeat (in particular concerning citizens' rights).

3. The question of appeals to the Court of Justice

The Working Group may also have to address two topics which, although not arising directly from possible incorporation of the Charter, are nevertheless often raised in connection with the protection of fundamental rights within the Union:

- firstly, the Working Group will have to decide whether to amend the fourth paragraph of Article 230 of the EC Treaty in order to extend the scope of direct appeals by individuals to the Court of Justice, or indeed to introduce a new form of appeal for the protection of fundamental rights, or whether it considers it preferable to maintain the existing system and leave it to case-law to refine it.
- secondly, the Working Group will have to take note of the question of a possible extension of the Court of Justice's competence in JHA matters. It should be pointed out that problems in this area go beyond the issue of fundamental rights and affect the more general debate to be conducted in plenary on the future development of this policy. The Working Group should therefore avoid prejudging that debate; it could nevertheless usefully make a limited contribution by examining criticisms to the effect that the current provisions should be revised with regard to the protection of human rights.

II. Implications of any accession by the Community/Union to the ECHR

The Working Group's discussion of this aspect will depend to a greater extent on the questions raised by its members. I shall not, for my part, encourage the Working Group to rehearse again in detail all the familiar arguments for and against accession by the Community/Union to the ECHR. I shall concentrate rather on a technical examination of the extent to which accession can be reconciled with the principle of autonomy of Community law. If, however, members of the Working Group wish to raise other points sometimes made against accession, I am prepared to see that it looks for satisfactory answers.

Moreover, the Working Group should consider the form which might be taken by any legal basis for accession to the ECHR in the Treaties. It could also address the question of whether that legal basis could also explicitly enable accession to other international human-rights agreements.

In addition, the Working Group will be informed of ongoing discussions within the Council of Europe on the technical consequences of any accession by the EU/EC for the Strasbourg system. I will, however, recommend the Working Group not to deal with those issues – which would be a matter for possible negotiations between the Union and the Council of Europe – unless the latter regards some of them as important for accession.

Finally, if members of the Working Group so request, it may also examine the advantages and disadvantages of approaches sometimes suggested as alternatives to accession in order to ensure consistency between Union law and that of the ECHR, e.g. the introduction of a procedure whereby the Court of Justice can refer to or consult the European Court of Human Rights.

The first meeting of Working Group II (Charter) was held on 25 June 2002 from 14.30 to 16.30 with Commissioner Antonio Vitorino as Chairman.

I. Work programme and timetable

1. The work timetable was approved:

|                   |               |
|-------------------|---------------|
| 12 July 2002      | 14.30 – 18.30 |
| 23 July 2002      | 10.00 – 18.30 |
| 17 September 2002 | 10.00 – 18.30 |
| 4 October 2002    | 14.30 – 18.30 |
| 29 October 2002   | 14.30 – 18.30 |

7 or 8 or 18 October (reserve dates)

2. Work programme: The Chairman mentioned the Group's two main topics (incorporation of the Charter and accession to the ECHR), as covered in the discussion paper CONV 116/02, which he intended to submit for examination by the Group later on. Towards the end of its discussions, the Group would also cover access to the Court of Justice and the Court's competences, a question linked to the two aforementioned main topics and also covered in the discussion paper.

3. Hearings. Given the nature of the subjects to be covered, the Group agreed that it would hear representatives of the Court of Justice of the European Communities and of the European Court of Human Rights. At the request of a member of the Group, the Chairman undertook also to make arrangements with a view to hearing the Directors-General of the Legal Services of the Commission, Council and European Parliament.

Furthermore, the Chairman announced that he would convene an additional meeting of the "human rights" contact group, a meeting in which all the members of the Working Group would be invited to take part, so that they could hear representatives of civil society.

4. Working languages. It was agreed that, purely as a result of technical constraints, interpreting could only be provided in French and English for working groups. If a group member indicated an imperative need to speak in another language, the Secretariat would explore the practical possibilities.
5. Access to meetings. The Chairman announced that, in the interests of conducting proceedings efficiently, access to the Group's meetings would for the time being be restricted to members of the Convention (members of the Group and others) and to collaborators designated by the members. It remained possible that access might be extended to the public at a later stage.

II. Procedures for and consequences of any incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties – initial discussion

6. The Group held an initial exchange of views on the above subject. The following points in particular were mentioned:
  - The positions of certain governments on the political issue of incorporating the Charter were still hesitant, irrespective of the Group's technical examination of the procedures for this.

- By general agreement, it had to be acknowledged that the Charter's content had been drafted by the previous Convention and that it would not now be appropriate to rewrite it.
  - In that context, several members referred to the legitimacy and representative nature of this prior Convention and felt that what was needed now was to concentrate on examining the procedures for integrating the Charter into a basic treaty or a Constitution. Others, however, maintained that there were differences between adopting the Charter as a political declaration and the idea of giving such a text the force of law. In the latter case certain questions would arise, such as, in particular, whether it might give rise to new rights for individuals, or to new competences for the EU, or again what the relations would be between the Charter, the Treaty and the ECHR. In that connection, some wondered whether the present horizontal clauses were sufficient; others were doubtful of the value of debating those clauses again.
  - One difference between the earlier Convention and the present one was that the candidate countries had not taken part, even if they had been consulted in a hearing. From that point of view, it was suggested that it might be appropriate to examine or explain the solutions reached in the earlier Convention.
  - The Group could examine whether it was possible to provide a mechanism for review of the Charter in the future.
  - The role of the Court of Justice and its relationship to national courts if the Charter were incorporated should be examined.
7. The Chairman concluded by stressing that this first debate had confirmed that henceforth, taking a pragmatic approach, the various technical points addressed in CONV 116/02 should be examined, as should certain additional questions that had been raised, which would be discussed in connection with those technical points as the work of the Group progressed.

THE EUROPEAN CONVENTION

Brussels, 12 July 2002

THE SECRETARIAT

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS

Subject: Meeting of the Praesidium
Brussels, 10 July 2002

POINTS SETTLED*1. Preparation of the Convention session of 11-12 July and Working groups*- External Action and Defence

The Praesidium noted that the descriptive document on EU External Action had been circulated to members of the Convention (CONV 161/02) and that the questions contained in it should assist in structuring the debate.

- Working groups

As to working groups, the Praesidium confirmed its agreement on the setting up of four new working groups, the first on 'security and justice' (for which the mandate had already been circulated in doc 179/02), the second on 'external relations', the third on 'defence policy' and the fourth on 'simplification of legislative procedures'. Two suggestions for further working groups were put forward by members of the Praesidium : one on 'culture and linguistic differences' and the other one on 'good governance' : it was concluded that the former, and perhaps the latter, subject would be covered in working group V, chaired by Mr. Christophersen.

- Introductory statement

The Praesidium agreed that the Chairman should make an introductory statement before the start of the debate on External Action. The purpose of this statement would be to ensure that the Convention understood the Praesidium's thinking on working groups, and the Praesidium's "building block" approach, together with their plan to prepare, in the light of reports from the working groups on legal personality and the Charter, a framework for a constitutional Treaty, which would be put forward at the end of October.

This framework would then be fleshed out with the contributions emerging from the second wave of working groups and would then constitute the basis for the work on the Convention from the beginning of next year.

- Proposal by certain members of the Convention

As to the proposal put forward by certain members of the Convention to invite the Commission to prepare a draft constitutional treaty (item 4 of the session's agenda), the Praesidium unanimously agreed that the proposal was unacceptable since it would imply that the Convention would shirk its own responsibilities.

2. Mr. Avgerinos' letter to the Chairman and revised draft reply

The Praesidium approved the draft reply (circulated then in doc. 185/02).

3. Autumn Plenary Debates

The Praesidium agreed that the subjects for the first autumn Convention Plenary debates should be "simplification" (of the legislative procedure) on 12-13 September, and "subsidiarity" on 3-4 October. Mr Mendez de Vigo agreed to give the Convention on 12-13 September an oral preview of the likely recommendations of the subsidiarity working group, and confirmed that the groups report would be available before 3-4 October. In addition, Vice-president Amato agreed to give a similar oral preview on the issue of legal personality on 12-13 September, and Mr Vitorino agreed to give a similar presentation on the Charter on 3-4 October.

II. OUTSTANDING ISSUES

4. Working groups Chairs

Since Ms Palacio was not present, the Praesidium agreed to postpone to its next meeting decisions on the chairs of the four new working groups.

5. Strategy discussion

The Praesidium had a preliminary exchange of views on the implications of the various options for the simplification of Treaties. It agreed to revert to this issue; some members mentioned the usefulness of hearing legal opinion on this subject.

6. Secretariat paper on public relations and visibility

The Praesidium agreed to discuss this issue at its next meeting.

The next Praesidium meeting will take place on 18 July, at 15h00 in Palais d'Egmont and will last until 22h00.

| Subject : | Summary of the meeting held on 12 July 2002 chaired by Commissioner Antonio VITORINO |

---

The second meeting of Working Group II (Charter) was held on 12 July 2002 between 14.30 and 17.30 under the chairmanship of Commissioner Antonio Vitorino.

I. Timetable of meetings

1. The following dates for forthcoming meetings were confirmed:

- 23 July (all day)
- 17 September (all day)
- 4 October (afternoon)
- 7/8 October (dates in reserve)
- 21 October as the date of the final meeting – instead of 29 October as originally planned; this would enable the Group to conclude its proceedings before the plenary session of the Convention at the end of October, with a view to the presentation of an initial architecture for the Treaty as announced by the Chairman of the Convention, Mr Valéry Giscard d'Estaing.

II. Procedures for and consequences of any incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties

– Possible techniques for incorporation of the Charter

2. The Chairman opened a preliminary discussion on the subject, stressing that the Group would return to this crucial issue during its proceedings. He also highlighted:

- the relationship between the idea of a basic treaty and its length, and the choice of options (as presented in CONV 116/02), none of them being a priori incompatible with this idea;
- the various possibilities for combining the options presented;
- the question of the preamble, which had to be borne in mind in this context.

3. A majority of speakers favoured the insertion of the full body of the Articles of the Charter in a new basic treaty (option (f)), particularly because of expectations concerning the visibility and transparency of the fundamental rights of the Union, as expressed in particular by civil society and by the Youth Convention; the fundamental importance of a catalogue of such rights at the beginning of a basic treaty or constitution; and the "normative" character of the Charter, drafted "as though" it were destined to appear in the treaty.

4. Other speakers variously pointed out that:

- the concern to abide by the fundamental rights which were already in existence and to preserve the position of the Member States were (given the Group's approach of not modifying the Charter) arguments in favour of options (a) or (b), and that the benefits of this text as a declaration should not be under-estimated;
- the final choice between these options would be a political decision to be taken later, but depending on the answers to certain technical questions to be examined by the Group;

- there might be possibilities for an intermediate solution, as for example a protocol (option (e)), combined with a reference to the Charter in an article of the basic Treaty;
- that the choice of technique should also respect the desire not to weaken the pan-European ECHR system.

5. A number of speakers stressed that the preamble to the Charter, which was an essential part of it, had been drafted in such a way that, besides fundamental rights, it more generally encompassed the values and foundations of the Union. In the opinion of these members, the preamble could therefore be used (possibly with additions) as the preamble to a new basic treaty.

6. The Chairman concluded by stressing that, when the choice of technique for incorporating the Charter was made, several concerns had to be addressed including the political visibility and importance of fundamental rights, and also legal certainty. He also reminded members of the two facets of the compromise concerning the Charter, pointing out that at the time of its adoption, consensus was reached on a political declaration, but that the text had a legal profile as it had been drafted "as though" it was to be incorporated into the Treaties.

- The question of the current Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty (relationship between the Charter and the ECHR on the one hand, and the common constitutional traditions on the other).

7. Some members of the Group were in favour of deleting of Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty if the Charter were incorporated as a fully binding text, given that the Charter included the rights in the ECHR and was already considered by the Court of First Instance as an interpretation of the common constitutional traditions; in any case it contained references to both these sources in its preamble. However, others were in favour of maintaining Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty or a similar provision. Those members pointed out that the Charter did not contain all the rights guaranteed in the ECHR and its protocols, and that a provision such as Article 6(2) could favour an interpretation of the Charter in the light of common constitutional traditions. What is more, it would make the system open to future developments, enabling the Court of Justice to take account of new constitutional features which might emerge amongst the Member States.

8. The idea was also put forward that since common constitutional traditions had served as a third major source for the Charter (besides the rights in the ECHR and the EC Treaty), the desire to establish harmony between these three sources argued in favour either of the addition of a horizontal provision on constitutional traditions similar to those relating to the other two sources, or of the addition in Article 6(2) of the Treaty of an element which met this concern. If such an addition were not made, there would be a risk that the incorporation of the Charter would give too much political power to the Community court. However, others remarked that the Court of Justice's margin of discretion was greater nowadays, in the context of a definition of Community fundamental rights purely through case-law. They added that it was very difficult to define common constitutional traditions and the Court would not necessarily be able to deduce rights identical to those existing in all the constitutions of the Member States, nor only retain the lowest common denominator.

9. Some members commented that the question of Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty should be revisited after the Group had discussed accession to the ECHR. The Chairman confirmed this approach, stating that he saw scope for maintaining the references in Article 6(2), but that in any case the impact of any decision on accession to the ECHR on their wording would have to be examined.

– The Charter and the competences of the Union

The Chairman introduced the debate, presenting his working document, and stated that he himself saw no contradiction between the Charter and the limited competences of the Union.

10. All speakers stressed the importance, already highlighted by the previous Convention, of the principle that the incorporation of the Charter should not affect the distribution of competences between the Union and the Member States, and welcomed the significant clarification contained in the Chairman's working document (WD 03) in this respect. It was noted that the previous Convention wanted to draft a complete list, in the desire to give visibility to all the common values of the Union, particularly in the context of its international relations.

11. Several speakers felt that editorial amendment to Article 51(2) of the Charter would be useful if option (f) were chosen, as suggested in the Chairman's working document (clarifying that the Charter, incorporated into the Treaties, did not modify the competences and tasks defined by the other provisions of the Treaties).

12. Following requests from the Group, the Chairman Mr Vitorino undertook to submit a working document on possible editorial amendments to Articles 51(2) and 52(2) of the Charter, and to the "replications" in the Charter.

The third meeting of Working Group II (Charter) was held on 23 July 2002 between 10.00 and 12.15 and between 15.00 and 18.00 under the chairmanship of Commissioner Antonio Vitorino.

I. Modalities and consequences of incorporation into the Treaties of the Charter

- The question of "replication" in the Charter
- The examination of certain technical adjustments in the provisions of the Charter

1. The Chairman presented the agenda, explaining that the subjects to be discussed were covered by CONV 116/02 and explored further in the working document (WD 09). He said it was evident from those documents that if the Group opted for the incorporation of the full body of the articles of the Charter into a new basic Treaty (option (f)), then at this stage two technical adjustments would be necessary, concerning Articles 51(2) and 52(2) of the Charter, as explained in working document No 9. The aim of those adjustments would be not to change but to safeguard and clarify the meaning and scope of those Articles.

2. Regarding the question of the "replication" of the rights which already appeared in the EC Treaty and were repeated by the Charter, the Chairman raised two issues: the concern for legal certainty which had led to the drafting of Article 52(2) of the Charter, and which had to be guaranteed whatever option the Group chose; and the presentation and intelligibility of the new Treaty, which was a question which would notably arise in relation to the combination in any new basic Treaty of the articles of the Charter and those of the EC Treaty on the citizenship of the Union.
3. All the members of the Group welcomed the Chairman's working document No 9 and were particularly pleased with the proposal for the editorial clarification of Article 51(2). There was consensus on the principle that the incorporation of the Charter should not lead to any "inadvertent" extension of the competences of the Union; if the Convention wanted to propose extensions of competences it should do so by means of clear provisions in other parts of the Treaty.
4. So as to be certain of achieving this aim, several members asked that the Group should also examine the possible clarification of the second sentence of Article 51(1) of the Charter, concerning the obligation on those to whom the Charter was addressed to "promote the application thereof"; other members felt that the current wording of this clause already indicated sufficiently precisely that this obligation existed for the Union only within the framework of its competences.
5. Regarding the "replication" of rights which already appeared in the EC Treaty and were repeated in the Charter, all the members of the Group stressed the need for proper coordination in the interests of legal certainty, so that none of the current legal aspects of those rights, including any limitations on them, would be lost if the Charter were to be incorporated. It was generally recognised that Article 52(2) of the Charter would serve to guarantee this principle of legal coordination, but it was difficult at this stage to foresee what precise form any editorial adjustments to the clause might take, since this would depend on the future structure of the Treaties.

6. In this context it was argued that it would be difficult to incorporate the Charter by means of option (f), while retaining a referral clause such as the current Article 52(2), since this clause would result in the subordination of the Charter to the EC Treaty. However, this argument was challenged by several other members, who proposed that the relationship between the Charter and the EC Treaty should be characterised rather by a principle of "compatibility" or "specification" or "explanation" (of the rights of the Charter by the articles of the EC Treaty); appropriate legal solutions to ensure those principles could be designed, once the future structure of the Treaties was known.
7. For some members, an essential question in this area was whether a hierarchy would be established between a new basic Treaty and the rest of current primary law. The Chairman remarked that the idea of a basic Treaty did not necessarily presuppose the establishment of such a hierarchy, and the Group did not have a mandate to prejudge the Convention's approach to this question.
8. Members of the Group generally recognised that the "replication" between the Charter and the current EC Treaty should be accepted, given that the provisions of that Treaty also included legal bases which had to be preserved, and that a number of rights, particularly the freedom of establishment or of movement, which were enshrined in the EC Treaty in a very detailed fashion, could not be reproduced in full in the Charter.
9. Several members of the Group commented that the definition of citizenship (Article 17 of the TEC) and a provision on its future development (Article 22 of the TEC) should be incorporated into a future basic treaty, whereas the details of the rights of citizens could continue to appear in the second part of primary law. These members felt that this approach, and the combination of those articles with the articles of the Charter (incorporated into the basic treaty in accordance with option (f)) would not raise problems of a political nature. Various possibilities were suggested regarding the place to be set aside for the above two provisions in a basic treaty: either in a chapter of the treaty on democracy or the democratic system, or in the framework of the Charter's articles on citizenship.

10. Concluding this discussion, the Chairman invited members of the Group to submit written suggestions, if they so wished, concerning possible drafting adjustments to the horizontal articles of the Charter.
- II. Hearings of Mr Schoo, Director, Legal Service of the European Parliament, Mr Piris, Jurisconsult, Director-General of the Council Legal Service, and Mr Petite, Director-General of the Legal Service of the European Commission
11. The introductory presentations by the three experts<sup>1</sup>, which will be distributed to members of the Group as working documents, dealt inter alia, with the following main themes:
- The Charter and the competences of the Union: The three experts confirmed the existing distinction between the limited competences of the Union on the one hand, and the fundamental rights to be respected by its institutions on the other. However, according to Mr Piris, the current wording of the second sentence of Article 51(1) of the Charter, which stipulated an obligation to "promote..", could give rise to ambiguities of interpretation as regards the rights in the Charter relating to areas in which the Union did not have legislative competence. Mr Piris therefore recommended that certain minimal technical amendments should be made to Article 51 of the Charter so as to avoid any uncertainty about the principle that the Charter did not extend the competences of the Union. Mr Schoo and Mr Petite believed that this principle emerged sufficiently clearly from the current Article 51, but that a technical adjustment would be necessary to Article 51(2) of the Charter, if the Charter were to be incorporated using option (f). Mr Petite explained that in practice the Commission was already careful to ensure that the Charter was not used to justify competences for the Union.
  - The Charter and the EC Treaty: According to Mr Piris, the fact that articles in the Charter repeated rights already enshrined in the EC Treaty but without expressly reproducing all the conditions and limits laid down in the Treaty would jeopardise the full understanding of those rights by citizens. He therefore recommended that either all the conditions and limits in the current EC Treaty should be copied over into the Charter, or that the Charter should include references to the relevant articles of the EC Treaty.

Mr Petite explained that the previous Convention had had to make an "aesthetic" choice between two possible courses, either repeating the limits on the rights in each of the articles of the Charter, or stipulating them once and for all by means of the referral to the conditions and limits of the Treaty found in Article 52(2) of the Charter. Legally, the result – namely to make applicable the conditions and limits of the Treaty – was identical either way. Mr Petite concluded, as did Mr Schoo, that Article 52(2) satisfactorily regulated relations between the Charter and the EC Treaty. However he recognised that, if the Charter were to be incorporated by means of option (f), and depending on the new structure for the Treaties, a technical adjustment to Article 52(2) might be necessary to clarify to which legal text the clause referred. Mr Piris also recognised the necessity for Article 52(2), because in its absence the Charter would lead to a drastic modification to the EC Treaty on certain points; he then remarked that, if the Charter were to be incorporated into the Treaty, legal certainty and clarity would argue either for its deletion, provided that the conditions and limits laid down by the EC Treaty were included in the Charter, or for its clarification by an explicit reference to compliance with the conditions and limits laid down by the provisions of other parts of the Treaties.

- The Charter and the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR): Mr Petite and Mr Schoo said that the Charter had found a satisfactory compromise by reconciling several premises, given that the ECHR was only a minimum standard and that there was a need to reflect and preserve in the Charter those advances which had already been made in Community law and case-law (these two points were also mentioned by Mr Piris), but also that the harmonious development of the two European legal systems and their two Courts should be ensured, while respecting the principle of the autonomy of Community law.

While recognising that there was no legal necessity to amend the Charter if incorporated, if it was understood that the Charter offered more protection on some points than the ECHR, Mr Piris felt that legal uncertainty could result from the fact that the articles of the Charter had not reproduced the limits laid down in the ECHR, and that since Article 52(3) was not completely clear on this subject it would be for the Court of Justice to say whether those limits were applicable. According to Mr Petite, it was evident that the reference in Article 52(3) to the "meaning and scope" as conferred by the ECHR also included the ECHR's clauses on limits, and that the Court of Justice could not mistake this. With Mr Schoo, he did not see any legal uncertainty here.

- The importance of the horizontal clauses of the Charter: The three experts agreed on the essential role of the horizontal clauses of the Charter and on the need to retain them. Mr Piris and Mr Petite indicated that (in the case of incorporation according to option (f)), some adjustments which were purely a matter of legal form should be made to those clauses, but would in no way modify the substantive contents of the Charter.

- Accession by the EC/EU to the ECHR: The three experts were in favour of accession by the EC/EU to the ECHR, from a legal point of view. They all said that this would be the ideal solution to guarantee the harmonious development of the case-law of the two European Courts. In particular, the absence of a means for citizens to appeal to the Strasbourg Court against acts by the institutions constituted an anomaly (Mr Piris); accession would be of benefit even after the incorporation of the Charter, since it would establish an external control to which all the Member States were already subject (Mr Schoo and Mr Piris); the principle of the autonomy of Community law did not present an obstacle to accession (Mr Schoo and Mr Petite); and legal problems were currently posed for the EC/EU since the Court of Strasbourg was called on to take decisions on Union law without the Union being able to defend itself (Mr Petite). Mr Piris raised the possibility of "functional accession" if accession pure and simple would lead to political problems. Mr Petite stressed that one risk, feared by some, namely that accession could lead to an increase in the Union's competences as regards human rights, could easily be countered by technical clauses clarifying that accession would not have this concomitant effect.

12. Other issues explored in one or other of the individual contributions included the following:
- Mr Petite explained the degree to which the Charter, when incorporated into the Treaties, would bind the Member States. He stressed that the wording of Article 51(1) of the Charter on this point would only reproduce current case-law on the application of Community fundamental rights to the acts of the Member States, and that the very cautious line followed to date by the Commission and the Court would therefore continue to apply after the Charter had been incorporated. As a result, the Charter would only cover a very narrow area amongst the vast range of legislative or administrative acts by the Member States. This also meant that the provisions of the Charter would only be invoked very exceptionally with "direct effect" before the national courts.
  - Regarding the rights of the Charter found in sources other than the ECHR and the EC Treaty, Mr Petite observed that it would be difficult to draft a "referral clause" similar to those in Articles 52(2) and (3) of the Charter, as there was no single written reference text; in relation to those rights the Court had used a multitude of sources of inspiration which left it with a wide margin of discretion. It would be illusory to believe that the Court could define those rights with a meaning identical to that enshrined in each of the fifteen national constitutions. Mr Piris noted that some rights in the Charter had not yet been enshrined in the constitutions of all the Member States. On the other hand, Mr Petite commented that the Court of Justice had already in the past taken inspiration from international conventions, notwithstanding the fact that some Member States had entered reservations regarding them, and the fact that the Charter had been inspired by such instruments did not mean that it incorporated them as such into Union law.
  - Mr Piris commented that some provisions of the Charter lacked precision, since although the Charter explicitly contained "rights", "freedoms" and "principles", it did not state which provisions of the Charter fell into each of these three categories, which could lead to risks of legal uncertainty and the creation of legitimate expectations.

- Mr Schoo explored the consequences of the incorporation of the Charter for legal remedies before the Court of Justice, proposing an adjustment to Article 46(d) of the current TEU concerning the Court's control – as already exercised – over the acts of the Member States when they are implementing Union law. In principle, the Court of Justice should exercise its role as constitutional court in relation to justice and home affairs in the same way as it does for classic Community law. Mr Schoo also wondered whether it would be necessary to amend the conditions for direct appeal by individuals (fourth paragraph of Article 230 of the TEC) to allow them easier access to the courts, without this leading to open public recourse.

13. In the Group's discussions with the experts, the following points were raised:

- The three experts confirmed that the reference in Article 52(2) of the Charter to the conditions and limits defined by the Treaties included the implementing provisions of secondary law, without these needing to be expressly mentioned.
- When questioned about the usefulness of retaining Article 6(2) of the current EU Treaty in the case of incorporation of the Charter and accession to the ECHR, the three experts stated that this was a political question; Mr Piris and Mr Petite felt that a reference to constitutional traditions common to the Member States could remain useful, while Mr Schoo commented that there would be some ambiguity in the system if Article 6(2) of the TEU was retained.
- Regarding the idea of a hierarchy between the basic treaty and the rest of primary law, the three experts pointed out that such a hierarchy had never been established amongst the elements currently making up primary law, that it did not arise automatically from the idea of a basic treaty, and that it could only result from a political choice which would have to be clearly expressed.
- Mr Petite and Mr Piris confirmed that if the Charter were to be incorporated, then the national reservations entered by the Member States with regard to international human rights conventions would remain applicable, as they had done to date, as regards the autonomous action of those States.

- Asked – as an example of the consequences of the Charter – about its effects on the recognition of single sex unions, Mr Schoo pointed out that this question had already arisen in Community law independently of the Charter, but said that Article 9 of the Charter confirmed the competence of the national legislator on this subject. The Chairman of the Group referred on the one hand to the judgment by the Court of Justice last year, handed down after the Charter had been proclaimed, and following the conclusions of the Advocate-General who had examined the Charter, in which the Court confirmed the different situation of marriages and such unions; and on the other hand to a very recent judgment by the European Court on Human Rights which contained a liberal reading of the right to marry concerning transsexual persons.

III. Other business:

14. One member of the Group wondered if it would perhaps be useful to have a Working Group on the judicial architecture of the Union. The Chairman indicated that this subject had been noted in his document setting out the mandate for the current Group and in CONV 116/02, but said that he would also bear it in mind in future discussions in the Praesidium.

THE CHARTER OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

Comments

by Mr Johann SCHOO
Director in the Legal Service of the European Parliament

Brussels, 23 July 2002

I. Introduction

Your working party's task is to deal with the following two issues:

- the ways in which the Charter might be incorporated into the treaties and the implications of such a step, and
- the implications of any accession by the EU to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).

I am certainly not going to deal with the political issue, i.e. whether the Charter should be incorporated; Parliament's views on the matter were clear before, during and after the proceedings of the first Convention. Furthermore, that Convention drew up its text as though the Charter were to be incorporated wholesale.

II. Ways in which the Charter might be incorporated into the treaties and the implications of such a step

The question which concerns us here is that of deciding whether or not the Charter – with its existing substance and structure – is suitable for incorporation.

Arguing against such incorporation is a whole series of reservations which may be grouped under three main criticisms:

- (1) the Charter contains fundamental rights which do not fall within the EU's area of competence;
- (2) the Charter contains provisions which appear in a different form in the treaty or in the ECHR;
- (3) the general clauses of the Charter are not sufficient to enable the latter to be incorporated into the treaties.

First criticism

- (1) As regards the fundamental rights which lie outside the EU's area of competence, the following three points may be made:

Firstly:

- (a) The task of the Convention on the Charter was to bring fundamental rights together in a single text, drawing on various sources, in particular the constitutional traditions common to the Member States and their common general principles. That text therefore reflects the wealth of the fundamental rights recognised by the Member States, irrespective of the current applicability thereof.
- (b) Although some of those rights are not applicable at first sight and as things currently stand, this does not mean that they will not be so in future (particularly in view of the way in which Union law is evolving within the third pillar and under Title IV of the EC Treaty and Articles 54 to 58 of the Schengen Agreement). In any event the inclusion of virtual (or dormant) fundamental rights is not a problem, since Article 51(2) stipulates that the Charter does not establish any new power or task and, pursuant to Article 52(2), the fundamental rights recognised are based on the treaties, i.e. they are exercised solely within the context of Community law.
- (c) It is still difficult to define exactly which fundamental rights lie outside the EU's area of competence. To give an example: no-one would have thought that the right to freedom of religion would be a fundamental right falling within that area. However, Case 130/75, PRAIS (ECR 1976, 1589) - a staff case - teaches us quite the opposite. It is not therefore impossible that other fundamental rights which do not currently appear to be a matter for the EU may in future be taken into consideration by the Court of Justice.

Second criticism

- (2) The Charter contains provisions which appear in a different form in the treaty or in the ECHR

As regards consistency of the Charter provisions with the EC Treaty, there are a number of issues to be discussed:

- (a) the scope of the general cross-reference contained in Article 52(2) of the Charter,
- (b) duplication of those provisions, and
- (c) the specific case of the relationship between Article 21(1) of the Charter and Article 13 of the EC Treaty.

re (a) In our opinion the cross-reference clause contained in Article 52(2) of the Charter adequately clarifies the relationship between the fundamental rights detailed in the Charter and the treaty provisions concerned with the same subject, by stating that rights recognised by the Charter shall be exercised under the conditions and within the limits defined by the Treaties. At one and the same time this clause elegantly acts as an inherent limit on each fundamental right and thereby avoids constant repetition of the limits in each article.

re (b) As regards the duplication of provisions, it should first of all be pointed out that the number of provisions involved is very small (the freedoms laid down in the EC Treaty, the rights stemming from citizenship, and non-discrimination).

The cross-reference clause contained in Article 52(2) of the Charter also removes any ambiguity which may arise as a result of there being two identical provisions.

However, it must not be forgotten that the treaty provisions to which the Charter refers often serve a purpose which goes beyond that of creating a right: they contain legal bases and objectives to be achieved, and they should therefore remain in force.

re (c) As regards the specific case of non-discrimination referred to in Article 21(1) of the Charter and Article 13 of the Treaty, there is - in our opinion - no incompatibility, given that the two provisions pursue different aims:

- Article 13 of the EC Treaty is primarily a legal basis authorising the EC to combat discrimination by means of legislative measures applicable to individuals. Article 21 of the Charter, on the other hand, is a fundamental right directly applicable and binding on the Community bodies and institutions and, to a certain extent, on the Member States (Article 51(1) of the Charter).
- Furthermore, the rather unusual two-paragraph structure of Article 21 is the result of the fact that the drafters of the Charter had to abide by and incorporate the principle of non-discrimination between EU citizens, as laid down in Article 12 of the EC Treaty. For this reason, discrimination based on nationality is no longer mentioned in the first paragraph of Article 21 of the Charter. The Member States and the EU are therefore free to practise a degree of differential treatment in favour of EU citizens.

To conclude as regards these points

- There is no uncertainty, therefore, regarding the way in which the Charter provisions are to be interpreted by comparison with the Treaty articles on the same topic. The cross-reference clauses contained in Article 52 of the Charter have enabled relationships to be clarified.
- The same approach has been adopted in the case of the Charter articles which incorporate the guarantees contained in the ECHR: Article 52(3) serves to ensure that the rights laid down in both texts are applied in the same way, whilst allowing the EU to provide more extensive protection.

Third criticism

- (3) The general clauses (Articles 51 to 54) are not sufficient to enable the Charter to be incorporated into the Treaty

It is considered in certain quarters that the general clauses - Articles 51 to 54 of the Charter - are not sufficient to enable the Charter to be incorporated into the Treaty, either because they constitute a source of ambiguity at a time when the articles of the Charter have the same legal value as those of the Treaty, or because they would undermine legal certainty in so far as they are designed to prevent conflicts between the Charter and the corresponding provisions of the ECHR.

- (a) In our opinion, there would be no fear of either ambiguity or legal uncertainty if the Charter were to be incorporated into the Treaty - quite the contrary. As has already been said, the cross-reference clauses serve to clarify the relationship between the Charter and the Treaty and the ECHR, with a view to making that relationship binding. Such clauses would be superfluous in the case of a Charter with mere political value but they are, on the other hand, essential to the proper application of fundamental rights which are part of primary legislation.

At the risk of repeating myself:

- Although the Charter and the Treaty are on an equal footing, the cross-reference clause contained in Article 52(2) of the Charter states unequivocally that the fundamental rights concerned are exercised under the conditions and within the limits defined by the Treaties. The only editorial change to be made would be to replace the reference to 'Community Treaties' and to the 'Treaty on European Union' by a wording which takes into account the way in which the Charter would be incorporated into the Treaty.
  - It should also be pointed out that the current Treaty also contains cross-references to provisions of equal status, and that this has not created any ambiguities (e.g. Articles 19 and 21 of the EC Treaty on citizenship which refer to Articles 190, 194 and 195 on participation in elections to the European Parliament and on the right to petition to the European Parliament or to apply to the Ombudsman).
- (b) As regards the alleged legal uncertainty stemming from the relationship between the Charter and the ECHR which - according to some authors - has not been resolved by means of the cross-reference clause contained in Article 52(3) of the Charter, suffice it to say that the purpose of that clause is to ensure that the corresponding rights are applied and interpreted identically. Since the ECHR lays down only a minimum standard, the clause takes account of the fact that, as applied by the Court of Justice, Community law has already gone well beyond this minimum standard and will certainly continue to do so.

There are several examples of higher levels of protection under Community law than are provided by means of the ECHR:

- Article 47 of the Charter - right of access to justice - extends to all the rights guaranteed under EU law and is not restricted solely to civil or criminal-law rights as provided for in Article 6 of the ECHR.
- Article 50 of the Charter - the principle of non bis in idem - is not restricted to a single State - (as in the case of the ECHR) but covers the entire territory of the EU.

In this connection there is a second ground for criticism: the risk of differing interpretations by the EU Court of Justice and the Court of Human Rights. However, Article 52(3) of the Charter does not affect current relations between the two courts, which remain quite separate as they interpret the law which is placed before them for their examination.

Any differences of interpretation will be excluded if the EU acceded to the ECHR. This would be an ideal arrangement leading to perfect harmony between the two bodies.

But even as the relationship between the two courts currently stands, any difference of opinion is largely theoretical since the Court of Justice, when referring to Court of Human Rights case law, has never refused to apply that law.

What is more, the relationships between the Member States' constitutional courts and the Court of Justice are not based on subordination either, but rather - as stated by the German Federal Constitutional Court in its 'Maastricht' judgment of 12 October 1993 - on cooperation. This same relationship should provide a framework for the Court of Justice and the Court of Human Rights as they seek to interpret the fundamental rights which fall within their area of competence.

I should also like to deal briefly with other issues which are included within your working party's terms of reference and which, if need be, may subsequently be considered in greater detail at the hearing. These issues are:

(III) The technical arrangements for the incorporation of the Charter into the Treaty,

(IV) The effects which such incorporation would have on appeals procedure, and

(V) The value of accession to the ECHR following incorporation of the Charter.

III. Technical arrangements for the incorporation of the Charter into the Treaty

In the basic document drawn up by your working party you have already listed the six technical options for incorporation of the Charter, ranging from appending it to the treaties in the form of a Solemn Declaration to including the full text in a title or chapter of the EU Treaty or even of a constitutional treaty.

The choice between these various options is undoubtedly a political one.

What is important from the legal point of view is that the rights should be binding. This would be achieved only if the Charter were to be incorporated into the Treaty, either in a Protocol appended to the Treaty or, at least, by means of a direct reference in the Treaty to the Charter as something incumbent upon the various bodies and institutions and, to a certain extent, upon the Member States.

If we opt for wholesale incorporation of the Charter into the EU Treaty or into a constitutional treaty (which is the best option as regards visibility and the one which is most in accordance with most of the Member States' constitutional traditions), a number of legal problems will arise.

1. The question of deleting Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty which refers to the external sources of fundamental rights, namely the constitutional traditions common to the Member States and the ECHR.

There is nothing to prevent this provision from being deleted, since the rights laid down in the ECHR have already been incorporated into the Charter, which is already recognised (by the Court of First Instance and the Advocates-General of the Court) as being the best distillation of the Member States' common constitutional traditions as regards fundamental rights (Case T-54/99, Court of First Instance judgment of 31 January 2002, max-mobil).

2. Another problem concerns the preamble to the Charter, which could be kept in its existing form if the Charter became a Protocol, but which would have to be incorporated into the preamble of a new treaty and constitute the first part thereof if the Charter were to be incorporated.
3. There is still the issue of the 'duplication' of treaty articles in the Charter. This issue has already been dealt with briefly in connection with the cross-reference clauses.

If we examine this aspect more closely, we could draw a distinction between two types of duplication:

- on the one hand, the treaty articles which are not just fundamental rights but which also provide a legal basis upon which the legislator is authorised to act (e.g. Articles 12, 13, 141, 39 and 40 of the EC Treaty). The two bodies of text should therefore continue to coexist.
- on the other hand, the treaty articles which contain only citizens' rights (such as Articles 18 and 19 of the EC Treaty) and which are a mere repetition of the rights contained in the Charter, could be deleted.

IV. The effects of Charter incorporation on appeals procedures

Should the Charter be incorporated into primary law and be made binding, this would have a number of effects as regards the powers of the Court of Justice.

1. Article 46(d) of the EU Treaty

First of all, I entirely agree with the idea contained in your first working memo, in which it is suggested that Article 46(d) of the EU Treaty should be amended in order to enable the Court of Justice to carry out judicial review for the purpose of ensuring that actions by EU bodies and institutions are in accordance with the Charter, as are those of the Member States when the latter implement EU law. This minimal adjustment is needed in order to bring the Treaty into line with the case law established by the Court which, since the Amsterdam Treaty came into force, has included the Member States in monitoring observance of fundamental rights when they act within the scope of Community law.

2. Extending the Court's powers to the third pillar

Consideration should likewise be given to whether and how the Court of Justice should play its role as a constitutional court in respect of justice and internal affairs (third pillar) and in Title IV of the EC Treaty. This should in principle be done in the same way as under traditional Community law.

This concerns the amendment to Article 35 of the EU Treaty and Article 68 of the EC Treaty.

I shall merely point this out, since the details of such a revision should be considered in the context of the general design of the new treaty and within the working party on justice and home affairs.

3. Improvements to the procedure for appeals by individuals

To round off this chapter, consideration should be given to the ways in which those who enjoy fundamental rights (i.e. private individuals or legal persons) are able to assert their rights before the courts.

There are at least two possibilities:

- either through the creation of a new appeals procedure based on the German model of a constitutional appeal ('Verfassungsbeschwerde')
  - or by means of an amendment to the terms and conditions of the existing Article 230(4) of the EC Treaty.
- (a) Given the current state of Community law and taking into account existing appeals procedures, the first option strikes me as excessively ambitious. A constitutional appeal (which would require other means of redress to be exhausted) would further prolong the duration of procedures. Furthermore, matters relating to fundamental rights may usefully be dealt with in appeals to national courts with the possibility of a reference for a preliminary ruling or in direct appeals lodged by individuals.
- (b) As regards Article 230(4) and the Court's highly restrictive interpretation of the criterion 'of direct and individual concern', it may usefully be considered whether or not the terms and conditions should be amended so as to allow private individuals and legal persons easier access to a judge, although without opening the door too wide and thereby allowing mass appeals.

This question is of topical interest: in his conclusions of 21 March 2002, Advocate-General Jacobs called for a degree of openness and acknowledged that an individual had a right of appeal 'where, to a significant extent, a measure is, or may be, damaging to his interests'.

We still need to wait until the day after tomorrow (until 25 July, when the Court is to issue its judgment in the above-mentioned case) in order to know whether or not there has been any development in case law or whether a revision of Article 230(4) of the EC Treaty will have to be envisaged.

V. Accession to the ECHR

The final question is that of deciding whether or not, once the Charter has been incorporated into Community primary law, there will still be a need for accession to the ECHR. A reply in the affirmative has been received from the recognised authorities (such as the Presidents of the two Courts concerned) and also from the European Parliament.

It is broadly agreed that the two options – the adoption of a binding Charter and accession to the ECHR – are complementary to one another and are not alternatives.

A number of legal questions need to be answered before such a statement can be made.

1. First of all, what is the point of accession if more extensive protection is available under EU law?

Answer: even if that is the case, the Court of Justice could arrive at a restrictive interpretation which would require a means of external review (to which, incidentally, all the Member States and their constitutional or supreme Courts are already subject).

2. Secondly, would accession to the ECHR not be incompatible with the autonomy of Community law and, in particular, with that of the Court of Justice (which is the highest body entitled to interpret EU law)?

Answer: the Court of Justice's monopoly on interpretation is not affected by accession to the ECHR. In its opinion 1/94 on conformity between the EEA and the EC Treaty, the Court was in favour of setting up another court whose task would be to interpret and apply the rules drawn up under the agreement.

EU accession to the ECHR is a comparable situation and, therefore, does not therefore undermine the Court's autonomy.

In any case, following EU accession the Court of Human Rights will not become a supreme court vis-à-vis the Court of Justice, just as it has not become so vis-à-vis the Member States' supreme courts. Its area of competence will continue to be restricted to monitoring observance of the fundamental rights laid down in the ECHR. It will not be allocated any other power. The Court of Justice will retain sole responsibility for settling disputes both between the Member States and between the Member States and the institutions.

The advantages of accession are obvious: the EU will subject itself to the same external judicial review as its Member States whilst, at the same time, there will be uniform interpretation of the ECHR provisions (which is already envisaged in Article 52(3) of the Charter).

3. As regards the technical arrangements for accession, it is clear that the Treaty should provide a specific legal basis for that purpose in the wake of Opinion 2/94 of the Court of Justice (which took the view that Article 235 [now 308] is not adequate as a legal basis for accession).

The alternative arrangements imaginable (ranging from a referral mechanism to a right of appeal to the Court of Human Rights without accession) strike me as neither appropriate nor in accordance with Community law.

VI. Conclusion

The first Convention on the Charter was a success: it provided a complete text of the fundamental rights derived from the constitutional traditions and the international obligations common to the Member States.

It was designed – thanks in particular to the general and final provisions – as though it were to be incorporated into a constitutional treaty.

From Parliament's point of view there is nothing to prevent it from being incorporated as it stands, subject to a few purely technical adjustments to the cross-reference clauses, depending on the way in which the Charter is to be incorporated into a constitutional treaty.

SPEAKING NOTE

Speech by Jean-Claude PIRIS <sup>1</sup> to the Convention Working Group on the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU (23 July 2002)

Taking account of the mandate of the Working Group <sup>2</sup>, and of the Note from the Praesidium <sup>3</sup>, I shall mainly address the question of the procedures required for integrating the Charter into the Treaties. My comments will be based on the political hypothesis of the Charter being incorporated either into the TEC, or into a unified TEU ("constitutional Treaty") embracing the current TEC. I will also address the question of possible EU/EC accession to the European Convention on Human Rights.

INTRODUCTORY COMMENTS:

The aim of the Charter, as laid down by the European Council <sup>4</sup>, is neither to create new fundamental rights, nor to free existing rights from the conditions and limits imposed on them by legal texts currently in force, nor to address the Member States directly. As the preamble to the Charter points out, its aim is to make fundamental rights "more visible" and to "reaffirm" those rights "with due regard for the powers and tasks of the Community and the Union".

The "Text of the explanations" relating to the Charter <sup>5</sup>, which played a decisive role in making it possible for certain Member States to adopt the Charter, and which was approved by the Praesidium

My comments will be divided into two main parts:

I. Would straightforward incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties, without any modification, give rise to risks of legal uncertainty and a lack of clarity?

II. Are Articles 51 to 53 of the Charter sufficient to overcome those risks and, if not, what technical arrangements would it be appropriate to make to ensure greater clarity and legal certainty, while fully respecting the substantive content of the Charter?

I will then say a few words on the legal implications of options other than incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties, and I will end by considering the question of possible EU (EC) accession to the ECHR on the same basis as a State, or its functional accession.

<sup>6</sup> Given the clarifications which it contains, it would be sensible to examine the possibility of taking over this text in an appropriate fashion, for example as a declaration annexed to the final act of the IGC which decides to incorporate the Charter into the Treaty.

I. WOULD INCORPORATION INTO THE TREATY OF THE CHARTER AS CURRENTLY FORMULATED GIVE RISE TO RISKS OF LEGAL UNCERTAINTY AND INSUFFICIENT CLARITY?

As stated in the mandate of the Working Group and the Note by the Praesidium, the Charter should be considered as adopted, without amendment to its substantive content. The final provisions of the Charter, particularly Articles 51 and 52, are an essential part of that substantive content:

under Article 51(1)<sup>7</sup>, the Charter is not addressed to the Member States acting in the framework of their national competences. It is addressed exclusively to the Union's institutions. It is only addressed to the Member States when they are implementing the law adopted by those institutions of the Union.

under Article 52(2)<sup>8</sup>, the rights enshrined in the Treaty and reflected by the Charter shall be exercised under the conditions and within the limits defined by the Treaty.

under Article 52(3)<sup>9</sup>, the meaning and scope of the rights guaranteed by the ECHR and reproduced in the Charter shall be the same as those conferred by the ECHR.

<sup>7</sup> "The provisions of this Charter are addressed to the institutions and bodies of the Union with due regard for the principle of subsidiarity and to the Member States only when they are implementing Union law. They shall therefore respect the rights, observe the principles and promote the application thereof in accordance with their respective powers".

<sup>8</sup> "Rights recognised by this Charter which are based on the Community Treaties or the Treaty on European Union shall be exercised under the conditions and within the limits defined by those Treaties".

<sup>9</sup> "Insofar as this Charter contains rights which correspond to rights guaranteed by the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the meaning and scope of those rights shall be the same as those laid down by the said Convention. This provision shall not prevent Union law providing more extensive protection".

These provisions constituted a condition for the approval of the Charter. To be certain of complying with them when incorporating the Charter into the Treaty, there is a need for a thorough legal scrutiny of the Charter. This examination shows that the Charter contains some differences in relation to the provisions of the TEC and the ECHR<sup>10</sup>.

I would like to make four comments on this subject:

(1) Some provisions of the Charter relate to areas in which the Treaties have not conferred competence on the EC

Some provisions of the Charter relate to areas where the Community does not have competence, which is reserved to Member States by virtue of the principle of the allocation of competence (see first paragraph of Article 5 of the TEC). In this respect one might mention Article 28 of the Charter on the right of collective bargaining and action, which includes the right to strike, whereas this right is expressly excluded from the Community's competence by Article 137(6) of the TEC. Article 2(2) of the Charter on the death penalty, Article 4 prohibiting torture, Article 14 on the right to education, Article 34 on the entitlement to social security benefits and social assistance, and indeed Articles 48, 49 and 50 on criminal law, might also be cited.

Professor Grainne De Burca: "Human Rights: the Charter and beyond"

Professor Jacqueline Dutheil de la Rochère: "Droits de l'homme : la Charte des droits fondamentaux et au-delà" ("Human Rights: the Charter of Fundamental Rights and beyond").

Professor Christopher McCrudden: "The future of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights".

The obligation to respect fundamental rights is not to be placed on the same level as competence to legislate, since the latter depends on the existence of a legal basis in the Treaty. That said, Article 51(1) imposes an obligation on the institutions and bodies of the Union not only to respect the provisions of the Charter but also to promote its application. The text states that they should do so "in accordance with their respective powers". But how? Could they promote the application of rules relating to matters where they have no competence? How can an article prohibiting torture be justified in a text which is only addressed to the institutions of the EU/EC and not to the Member States except when they are implementing Union law? There is a constant ambiguity in the text in that it appears to be addressed directly to the Member States, or to enlarge the existing competences of the European institutions, or to do both of these, when in fact each of these three hypotheses has in principle been ruled out.

(2) Some provisions of the Charter draw on provisions in the TEC or the ECHR, but modify them

Some articles of the Charter, which deal with an area covered by the TEC and the ECHR, contain provisions which differ from those texts. This is the case with the principle of non-discrimination<sup>11</sup>: drawing on Article 13 of the TEC and Article 14 of the ECHR, Article 21(1) of the Charter<sup>12</sup> provides for the prohibition of any discrimination based "on any ground such as " a range of examples, whereas Article 13 of the TEC<sup>13</sup> confers competence on the Community to take appropriate action to combat discrimination based on a smaller number of matters, which are not just quoted as examples (sex, racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation).

<sup>11</sup> This also applies to the right to marry: compare Article 9 of the Charter with Article 12 of the ECHR.

<sup>12</sup> In the "Text of the explanations" of the Charter (4473/1/00 REV 1), Article 21 of the Charter is not mentioned either amongst those articles of the Charter whose meaning and scope are the same as the corresponding articles of the ECHR, or amongst those where the meaning is the same but the scope wider.

<sup>13</sup> The text of Article 14 of the ECHR, supplemented in 2000 by Protocol No 12 to the ECHR, differs from the other two. However, it should be remembered that the ECHR is a "minimal" instrument: one can do more or better, but not less or worse. Hence, the fact that the Charter offers more protection than the ECHR is not a legal obstacle to its incorporation into the Treaties.

However, it might be queried whether the differences between Article 21(1) of the Charter and Article 13 of the TEC could give rise to uncertainty over the interpretation to be given to Article 13 of the TEC: in the cases of non-discrimination referred to in Article 21 of the Charter but not recognised by Article 13 of the TEC, such as colour, language, or membership of a national minority, would the Council be able to intervene on the basis of Article 13?

(3) Some provisions of the Charter reproduce the wording of a right recognised by the TEC or the ECHR, but without reproducing the conditions and limits

In the case of the TEC, this applies to the provisions on citizenship, for example Articles 39 and 40 of the Charter on the right to vote and to stand as a candidate at elections to the European Parliament and municipal elections respectively. Article 39 of the Charter lays down in a brief and apparently clear manner that: "Every citizen of the Union has the right to vote and to stand as a candidate at elections to the European Parliament in the Member State in which he or she resides, under the same conditions as nationals of that State". Although this article corresponds to the right guaranteed by Article 19(2) of the TEC, it does not reproduce the limits to the exercise of that right which are expressly laid down in the latter: "This right shall be exercised subject to detailed arrangements adopted by the Council, acting unanimously on a proposal from the Commission and after consulting the European Parliament; these arrangements may provide for derogations where warranted by problems specific to a Member State". These arrangements have been adopted by the Council in a Directive which will obviously have to be taken into account in determining the scope of the right referred to in Article 39 of the Charter, as would the national laws adopted to implement the Directive.

Thus, after becoming aware of his right by reading Article 39 of the Charter, the citizen would then have to refer to Article 51(2) of the Charter, then to Article 19(2) of the TEC, then to the Directive and finally to the national law relating to it, to discover that the extent of his right was not that apparently conferred by Article 39.

The same problem arises for other articles of the Charter, such as Article 40 on the right to vote and to stand as a candidate at municipal elections (see Article 19(1) of the TEC), Article 42 on the right of access to documents (Article 255 of the TEC), Article 43 on the Ombudsman (Article 195 of the TEC), Article 44 on the right to petition (Article 194 of the TEC), and Article 46 on diplomatic and consular protection (Article 20 of the TEC), which do not contain the limits and conditions laid down in the corresponding articles of the TEC, and which do not refer to them.

The reading of the articles of the Charter could therefore risk giving rise to legitimate expectations and infringing the principle of legal clarity: citizens are given to understand that they have some right, the possibility to obtain some benefit, or the power to exercise some competence or other, without specifying in a clear and utterly transparent fashion that that right, benefit or competence is subject to conditions and limits.

In the case of the ECHR, one might cite as an example the short Article 6 of the Charter on the right to liberty and security ("Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person"). The rights laid down in this Article correspond to those guaranteed by Article 5 of the ECHR, but Article 6 of the Charter does not reproduce the exceptions listed in Article 5 of the ECHR. The same applies to other articles of the Charter, which simply replicate the wording of the rights stated in the ECHR, without mentioning the exceptions and limits given there: Article 5(2) on forced labour (Article 4(3) of the ECHR), Article 7 on respect for private and family life (Article 8(2) of the ECHR), Article 10 on freedom of thought, conscience and religion (Article 9(2) of the ECHR), Article 11 on freedom of expression and information (Articles 10(1) and (2) of the ECHR) and Article 12 on freedom of assembly and of association (Article 11(2) of the ECHR). Article 15 of the ECHR, on the possibility of taking measures derogating from obligations under that Convention in time of war or other public emergency, is not reproduced in the Charter. Is the political choice that the exceptions, limits and derogations provided for in the ECHR will not apply within the EU, which is legally possible? But Article 52(3) of the Charter is ambiguous in this respect. It begins by stating that the meaning and scope of the rights contained in the Charter which correspond to rights guaranteed by the ECHR shall be the same as those laid down by the Convention, but adds that "this provision shall not prevent Union law providing more extensive protection". If the Charter were to be incorporated into the Treaty, it would therefore be difficult to determine what the legal situation would be.

(4) Some provisions of the Charter reproduce rights which stem neither from the TEC nor the ECHR and have not yet been recognised in all the Member States

This applies for example to Article 3 (origin: Council of Europe Convention on Human Rights and Biomedicine, not yet ratified by all the Member States; the fourth indent of Article 3(2) goes beyond that Convention, with the prohibition on the reproductive cloning of human beings); Article 10 (conscientious objection: origin – the constitutions of certain Member States); Article 24 (origin: United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child; some Member States entered reservations when they concluded it).

(5) Some provisions of the Charter lack precision

Although, according to its preamble, the Charter contains "rights", "freedoms" and "principles", it does not state which provisions of the Charter contain respectively "rights", "freedoms" or "principles", nor what are the consequences of this division into three categories. With the incorporation of the Charter into the Treaty, this lack of distinction between those provisions of the Charter which contain "rights" and those which contain "freedoms" or "principles" could lead to risks of legal uncertainty and the creation of legitimate expectations. This might be the case, for example, with Article 25 ("the Union recognises and respects the rights<sup>14</sup> of the elderly to lead a life of dignity and independence and to participate in social and cultural life") and Article 33(1) ("the family shall<sup>14</sup> enjoy legal, economic and social protection"), where the wording seems to indicate that this is a question of rights and not of principles.

I now come to the second stage of my analysis, in which I will endeavour to answer the following question:

II. ARE THE GENERAL PROVISIONS OF THE CHARTER (ARTICLES 51 TO 53) SUFFICIENT TO OVERCOME THESE RISKS AND, IF NOT, WHAT MINIMAL TECHNICAL ARRANGEMENTS COULD BE MADE TO ENSURE GREATER LEGAL CLARITY AND CERTAINTY, WHILE FULLY RESPECTING THE CONTENT OF THE CHARTER?

(1) Articles 51 and 52 of the Charter are intended to avoid conflicts between the provisions of the Charter and those of the TEC, but are insufficient to guarantee that:

Article 51(2) of the Charter states that "This Charter does not establish any new power or task for the Community or the Union, or modify powers and tasks defined by the Treaties".

Article 52(2) states that "Rights recognised by this Charter which are based on the Community Treaties or the Treaty on European Union shall be exercised under the conditions and within the limits defined by those Treaties". These two provisions appear to be necessary since, in their absence, the Charter would result in drastic modification to the Treaty on a number of points. It ensues that each article of the Charter containing rights stemming from the TEC should be read and interpreted as "subordinate" to the latter: the "substantive" provisions of the Treaty would prevail over those of the Charter. However, Articles 51(2) and 52(2) would risk lacking clarity if the Charter were to be incorporated into the Treaty, since the substantive articles of the Charter would have legal force equivalent to that of the other articles of the Treaty.

With legal certainty and clarity in mind therefore, a case could be argued either for clarification of these two articles (by an explicit reference to compliance with the conditions and limits laid down in other provisions of the Treaties, i.e. those which confer competence on the EC), or for the deletion of those articles, on the express condition, however, that:

every provision of the Charter is examined; the minimal technical amendments are introduced which are necessary to ensure that none of the provisions implies a modification to the competence conferred by the TEC; and the conditions and limits provided by the TEC are included for those rights (e.g. Articles 39 and 40 of the Charter and Article 19 of the TEC).

Neither of these options, which are purely a matter of legal form, would modify the substantive content of the Charter. One would achieve exactly the result sought by the previous Convention, but with more clarity and legal certainty.

(2) Articles 52(3) and 53 of the Charter are intended among other things to avoid conflicts between the provisions of the Charter and of the ECHR, but their content is not clear

Article 52(3) states that: "Insofar as this Charter contains rights which correspond to rights guaranteed by the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the meaning and scope of those rights shall be the same as those laid down by the said Convention. This provision shall not prevent Union law providing more extensive protection".<sup>15</sup>

Article 53 states that: "Nothing in this Charter shall be interpreted as restricting or adversely affecting human rights and fundamental freedoms as recognised, in their respective fields of application, by Union law and international law and by international agreements to which the Union, the Community or all the Member States are party, including the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, and by the Member States' constitutions".<sup>16</sup>

<sup>15</sup> In connection with this provision, the text of the explanations contains a list of articles of the Charter whose meaning and scope are the same as the corresponding articles of the ECHR, and another list of articles whose meaning or scope are not the same as the corresponding articles of the ECHR.

<sup>16</sup> This provision deals in an identical fashion with categories of law (international law and national laws) which do not have identical relations with Community law, which leads some people to believe that this article could be interpreted as going against the principle of the primacy of Community law as developed by the Court of Justice of the European Communities (judgment of 17.12.1970 in Case 11/70 Internationale Handelsgesellschaft [1970] ECR p. 1125, and judgment of 11.1.2001 in Case C-285/98 Kreil), and implicitly recognised by paragraph 2 of the Protocol on the application of the principles of

The apparent intention of these provisions is that, insofar as the rights of the Charter "correspond" to those guaranteed by the ECHR, their meaning and scope (including, a priori, their conditions and limits), should be the same as those provided by the ECHR. However, the same article provides that this provision "shall not prevent Union law providing more extensive protection", which corresponds to the fact that the ECHR constitutes a minimum standard. Since all the articles of the Charter would effectively, by dint of being incorporated into the Treaty, constitute "Union law", there would be an ambiguity: would the conditions and limits laid down by the ECHR apply or would they not? The Court of Justice in Luxembourg would have to decide on the matter. Insofar as the rights listed in the Charter correspond to rights guaranteed by the ECHR but are not identical, there would be a risk of divergent interpretations emerging from the two Courts.

(3) Since Articles 51 to 53 prove insufficient, minimal technical amendments to the Charter would therefore seem appropriate

It emerges from the legal analysis which I have just set out that Articles 51 to 53 of the Charter would only be sufficient if the Charter maintained its current status, or if the status conferred on it were subordinate to the other provisions of the Treaties; but they would not be sufficient to establish full legal clarity and certainty if the Charter were to be incorporated as currently worded into the Treaty, thus giving all its articles a binding legal force identical to that of all the other articles of the Treaty. This incorporation would infringe the principle of legal certainty and the objectives of simplification and visibility<sup>17</sup>. Minimal technical subsidiarity and proportionality which provides that "the application of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality...shall not affect the principles developed by the Court of Justice regarding the relationship between national and Community law..". Some feel that if the last part of Article 53 of the Charter were to be incorporated into the Treaties it would highlight the significance of the differences between the wording relating to fundamental rights in Union law and the constitutions of the Member States, thus increasing the risk of conflict between the Court of Justice of the EC and national supreme courts (see Ms Dutheil de la Rochère, 15.10.2001).

<sup>17</sup> The incorporation of the Charter into the Treaty would have the effect of rendering applicable the provisions of the TEC relating to the Court of Justice. The Court could have violations of the Charter referred to it, either in the form of requests for a preliminary ruling from national courts (depending on which provisions of the TEU or TEC applied) or directly from the institutions, the Member States or amendments to the Charter or to the Treaty would therefore seem appropriate if the Charter were to be incorporated into the Treaty.

As regards the ECHR, there would be no legal necessity to amend the Charter if the Convention and the future IGC were to decide that the Treaty (including the Charter) would offer even more protection than the ECHR than it does already in certain areas. In any case, reproducing in the Charter the full provisions of the corresponding articles in the ECHR would pose political difficulties in relation to those provisions of the Charter which represent a "step forward" in certain areas: see Article 3(2) (cloning), Article 8 (data protection), Article 9 (right for persons of the same sex to marry), Article 10(2) (right to conscientious objection), etc. If the Convention and then the Member States (at the IGC) were to confirm their desire to go further than the ECHR on these points, clear provisions to this end would have to be included in the Treaty.

As regards the EC Treaty, two avenues might theoretically be considered:

- Amendment to the Treaty: this possibility has been set aside by Article 51(2) of the Charter, according to which the Charter does not establish any new power or tasks for the Community or the Union, and does not modify the powers and tasks defined by the Treaties. This was, moreover, excluded by the Cologne European Council.
- Amendment to the Charter: if this path is followed, the Convention might wish to avoid any substantial amendment which risked calling into question the delicate compromise achieved when the Charter was being drawn up<sup>18</sup>. If this is the case, some minimal technical amendments would have to be envisaged:

Article 51(1): after "promote the application thereof in accordance with their respective individuals under the conditions laid down by the Treaty. Since fundamental rights form part of the principles of law with which the Court must ensure compliance, the Court already verifies compliance with fundamental rights by the Communities and by the Member States when they are implementing Community law.

powers" add "and respecting the limits of the competences of the EC as conferred on it by other parts of this Treaty";

Articles 39, 40, 42, 43 and 44: the proposal which I made a moment ago would be the clearest, namely to include the conditions and limits laid down in the TEC when addressing the rights concerned. Otherwise, in each article, one could add "under the conditions and limits set by Article (19), (20), (255), (194), (195) of (this Treaty/the TEC) [respectively]". Another solution would be to replicate the conditions and limits and to delete the corresponding articles of the current TEC.

III. WHAT WOULD BE THE LEGAL EFFECT OF OPTIONS OTHER THAN THE INCORPORATION OF THE CHARTER INTO THE TREATIES?

It might prove politically impossible to amend the text of the Charter, even in a limited fashion. If so, and as always when two different texts deal with the same question, the only reliable solution to ensure legal certainty would be to stipulate a hierarchy between the two texts, i.e. to make one have legal force subordinate to that of the other. At least five options are possible.

(1) The Charter could be included in the preamble to the Treaty

The text of the Charter would be reproduced, either in the preamble to the TEU, or in that of the "constitutional treaty" (in the case of a merger of the Treaties and the establishment of a "constitutional treaty"). However, according to case-law, the preamble to a Community act cannot be contrary to its enacting terms, at the risk of infringing the principle of legal certainty<sup>19</sup>. The basic principles on which this case-law is founded are equally valid for texts of primary law. The observations made earlier are therefore also applicable in this

<sup>19</sup> See the judgment of 24.1.1995 (Case T-5/93 [1995] ECR p. II-0185), in which the Court of First Instance judged that: "A contradiction in the statement of the reasons on which a decision is based constitutes a breach of the obligation laid down in Article 190 of the Treaty such as to affect the validity of the measure in question if it is established that, as a result of that contradiction, the addressee of the measure is not in a position to ascertain, wholly or in part, the real reasons for the decision and, as a case, to ensure legal clarity. Furthermore, the current form of the Charter, which is drafted in binding form (use of "shall" and wording expressing compulsion) is not appropriate for the text of a preamble.

(2) The Charter could be "attached" <sup>20</sup> to the Treaty in the form of a solemn declaration

Attaching the Charter in this way would present no legal difficulty. It would reinforce the status of the Charter and its high symbolic and political value. The development of its legal force would probably be encouraged and accelerated.

(3) Article 6(2) of the TEU could refer to the Charter

In this case it would not be necessary to amend the text of the Charter, if it were mentioned in Article 6(2) of the TEU in terms which avoided conferring binding legal force on it. The European Parliament suggested (in 4804/00) to the IGC 2000 that reference should be made to the Charter in Article 6(2) of the TEU, using the following wording: "2. The Union shall respect the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and fundamental rights.....". Since this wording would confer binding legal force on the provisions of the Charter ("The Union shall respect.."), it would present the same difficulties as those raised by straightforward incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties. It would be possible to imagine appropriate wording by using the right vocabulary ("reflection", "confirmation", etc.).

(4) The Charter could be both reproduced in a solemn declaration attached to the Treaty and mentioned in Article 6(2) of the TEU

This option, which would combine the two possibilities described above, would strengthen the status of the Charter. Its status as a declaration attached to the Treaties would be reinforced by the explicit reference to it in Article 6(2) of the Treaty. Politically, one would be very close to "incorporation" into the Treaties. Legally, the development in the status and result, the operative part of the decision is, wholly or in part, devoid of any legal justification". See also the judgment of 30.3.2000 (Case T-65/96 [2000] ECR p. II-1885).

<sup>20</sup> It would be preferable to use the verb "attach" rather than "annex" in order to avoid any ambiguity with the terms of Article 311 of the TEC.

value of the Charter would be facilitated, making it possible in future for all those involved, including the Court of Justice, to take account of the Charter, without actually conferring the force of positive law on those of its provisions which went beyond the conditions and limits provided by the TEC and the ECHR.

(5) The Charter could maintain its current status

What would be the consequences of maintaining its status? It would be inaccurate to say that the Charter currently lacks any legal significance, and that maintaining the status quo would deprive it of any legal force. The Charter already has great political value and a certain legal status which is likely to develop.

Firstly, the Charter already constitutes a political reference point for the implementation of Article 6 of the TEU <sup>21</sup>.

Secondly, it is a highly symbolic text which is invested with definite legitimacy. The institutions are politically bound by the Charter, as their practice demonstrates. The President of the European Parliament has declared that ".. the Charter will be the law of the assembly". The Commission has decided <sup>22</sup> that any proposal for a legislative act will be scrutinised for compatibility with the Charter, and that any proposal for an act which has a specific link with fundamental rights will contain a recital specifying that the act complies with the Charter. The Council and the Parliament, as co-legislators, adopt such recitals <sup>23</sup>.

Thirdly, Advocates-General at the Court of Justice have already invoked the Charter, as has the Court of First Instance <sup>24</sup>.

<sup>24</sup> See the conclusions of Advocate-General Tizzano in Case C-173/99, Advocate-General Léger in Case C-353/99, and Advocate-General Jacobs in Case C-377/98. See also paragraph 48 of the judgment of the

In its communication of 11 October 2000 on the Charter, the Commission considers that "it can reasonably be expected that the Charter will become mandatory through the Court's interpretation of it as belonging to the general principles of Community law".<sup>25</sup> Without going that far, it ensues in any event from the above that the Charter can already be regarded as constituting a sort of "soft law" which is likely to acquire more authority in future, even if its status is not explicitly altered.

CONCLUSION

The incorporation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights into the Treaty will be an essential step in European construction. This incorporation should be carried out in such a way as to respect the imperatives of legal clarity and certainty so as to avoid any ambiguity or divergence in interpretation.

ANNEX*ACCESSION OF THE EU TO THE ECHR

The question of possible EU accession to the ECHR has been on the table for over twenty years, since the first Commission proposal to that effect. It has hitherto encountered obstacles of a legal nature (the present TEC does not permit accession: see Opinion 2/94 of the ECJ, of 28 March 1996<sup>1</sup>) and a political nature (ensuring increase in EC competence, fears regarding the autonomy of its judicial system, problems posed by the arrangements for full EC participation in an institutional system designed for States, etc).

The fact that no solution has been found to this problem has so far been of limited practical significance, given the protection afforded to the rights of Union citizens (through the case-law of the ECJ or indirectly through that of the European Court of Human Rights). The potential for conflict between the two European courts in Luxembourg and Strasbourg is at present low-level. However, it would increase if the Charter were to be incorporated into the Treaty. In addition, the question has considerable symbolic importance in the political terms. It is anomalous that citizens cannot complain to the European Court of Human Rights regarding a possible breach of the European Convention on Human Rights by an EC institution. This anomaly will become painfully obvious and will increase the risks of disparities between the case-law of the two European Courts of Justice if it is decided to incorporate the Charter into the Treaty.

There are two main ways of putting an end to this anomaly<sup>2</sup>. The solution has so far been sought in the form of straightforward EU accession, on the same basis and hence with the same rights as a State Party to the European Convention on Human Rights. Consideration could be given to another option, involving functional accession of the EC or the EU to the Convention. In accordance with the principle of subsidiarity, provision would be made for accession to be merely functional, i.e. only insofar as it proves necessary in order to deal with the questions I have just raised, avoiding some of the political obstacles mentioned above which would ensue if the EU were to accede on the same basis as a State.

<sup>2</sup> The reasons why the other options that have sometimes been mentioned would be inappropriate (requests for preliminary rulings from the ECJ to the European Court of Human Rights, creation of a special EU court or special chamber at the ECJ, etc.) would exceed the bounds of this brief summary.

A. FIRST OPTION: ACCESSION OF THE EC/EU TO THE ECHR ON THE SAME BASIS AS A STATE

MEANS

- Would require a revision of the Treaty (ECJ Opinion 2/94, 28.3.1996) and a revision of the European Convention on Human Rights, followed by negotiation of an agreement between the EU/EC and the Council of Europe.

MAIN CONSEQUENCES

- (1) Would permit citizens to seize the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg if they considered that an act of an EU (EC) institution had been adopted in breach of the provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights (under conditions similar to those existing at present for the States Parties: exhaustion of domestic remedies including appeals to the Court of Justice or the Court of First Instance etc.),
- (2) Would permit the EU (EC) institutions whose acts have been called into question to defend their legality before the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg.
- (3) Would resolve the problem posed by possible incompatibilities between the text of the Charter and that of the European Convention on Human Rights, as well as the problem of conflicts possibly arising between the case law of the two Courts, the ECJ in Luxembourg and the ECHR in Strasbourg, the risk of which could well increase if the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights were to be given binding legal force.

RELATED CONSEQUENCES

- (4) Would put the EU (or the EC) on the same level as the States Parties to the ECHR and therefore give them the same rights and obligations vis-à-vis the ECHR; thus the effect of revising the EU (EC) Treaty to allow accession to the ECHR on the same basis as a State would be to extend EU (EC) competence to all areas of fundamental rights, as it would be able to participate in revising the European Convention on Human Rights on the same basis as a State.
- (5) By aligning the EU-EC with the States Parties, the effect of revising the European Convention on Human Rights would be to enable the EU (EC) institutions to participate on an equal footing in the Strasbourg institutional system: participation in the Council of Ministers, voting rights, election of judges, etc.

B. SECOND OPTION: FUNCTIONAL ACCESSION OF THE EU/EC TO THE ECHR*MEANS

- After the introduction of an enabling article into the EU or EC Treaty and appropriate revision of the ECHR, would involve the conclusion of a Protocol annexed to the European Convention on Human Rights which would have effects identical to those of a straightforward accession for points 1, 2 and 3 above.

MAIN IDENTICAL CONSEQUENCES

- (1) EU citizens would be entitled to seize the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg if they considered that an act of an EU (EC) institution had been adopted in breach of the European Convention on Human Rights.
- (2) The EU (EC) institutions whose acts have been called into question would be able to defend their legality before the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg.
- (3) The questions raised above (possible incompatibilities between the Charter and the ECHR and possible conflicts between the case-law of the ECJ and that of the ECHR), would be settled in the same way.

LACK OF RELATED CONSEQUENCES

- (4) Functional accession would not in itself<sup>3</sup> have any effect on EU (EC) competence.
- (5) Functional accession would not involve the EU (EC) institutions participating on an equal footing with the States Parties in the Strasbourg institutional system (participation in the Council of Ministers, voting rights under the same conditions as a State Party, election of a judge, having the same competences as the other judges<sup>4</sup>, participation in proceedings before the Strasbourg Court even when those institutions were not involved in a case, etc.).

<sup>3</sup> Naturally, extension of EU (EC) competence could perfectly well be provided for by the Convention/IGC, although as a separate issue and not as a natural consequence of the solution to the problem that concerns us here.

<sup>4</sup> Article 29 of the Rules of Procedure of the ECHR, which provides for the possibility of designating "ad hoc judges" could be amended if deemed necessary, to allow the appointment of a judge for cases concerning Community/EU law. The possibility of a full-time EC/EU judge would not necessarily be excluded by functional accession.

Convention Working Party on the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU and accession to the ECHR
(Brussels, 23 July 2002)

Your Convention Working Party has discussed all the aspects of the Charter in depth. I should like to return simply to the core questions that you have already gone into at length:

1. Would the Charter extend the powers of the Union?
2. The question of the application of the Charter to measures taken by the Member States;
3. The "direct effect" of rights under the Charter;
4. The relation between the Charter and its "three main sources":
  - the Charter and the rights already enshrined in the EC Treaty;
  - the Charter and the European Convention of Human Rights;
  - the Charter and the constitutional traditions common to the Member States.

My conclusion is that, if the Charter is incorporated in the Treaty, it is vital to preserve its "horizontal" provisions, with very minor drafting amendments.

1. Would the Charter extend the powers of the Union?

- The importing thing here is to bear in mind the distinction between the powers of the Union (which are limited) and the duty of the institutions to respect fundamental rights when they act. This duty applies equally to rights such as the right to strike or the freedom of religion that the institutions could well affect indirectly by their measures, even if they cannot legislate on them.<sup>2</sup>
- This traditional distinction is recognised in the Court of Justice Opinion 2/94 (on accession to the European Convention)<sup>3</sup> and in the practice of the institutions;<sup>4</sup> it is particularly clear in working paper No 3 by your Working Party's Chairman. On this basis, it seems perfectly suitable that the Charter was designed as a full catalogue of all the fundamental rights that the Union must respect in its action, and Article 51(2) of the Charter seems to me to state beyond a shadow of a doubt that the Charter creates no new powers and amends none of the powers conferred by the Treaties.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>2</sup> And there have been certain more recent extensions to the powers of the Union, in particular in the field of criminal law, introduced by the Union Treaty ("third pillar"). In particular, the double jeopardy rule in Article 50 of the Charter is already laid down in Articles 54 to 58 of the Schengen Convention, Article 7 of the Convention on the protection of the financial interests of the Communities and Article 10 of the Convention on the fight against corruption (Council Conventions under the EU Treaty). This example clearly illustrates how useful it was to include the essential guarantees in criminal matters which must be respected in third-pillar law in Articles 48–50 of the Charter.

<sup>5</sup> See also J.-P. Jacqué, La démarche initiée par le Conseil européen de Cologne, Revue universelle des droits de l'homme, 2000, No 1/2, p. 6; J. Dutheil de la Rochère, "La Charte des droits fondamentaux et au-delà", conference organised by the Commission on 15 and 16 October 2001, pp. 15/16.

- If the Charter itself were incorporated into one of these Treaties (your option "f"), a drafting amendment could make clear that the Charter does not affect the system of powers as defined elsewhere in the Treaty.
- The Commission already interprets the Charter in this way: it systematically vets legislative proposals for conformity with the Charter, and in appropriate cases it mentions this in a recital and in the explanatory memorandum to the proposal.<sup>6</sup> But we ensure that these references to the Charter in the recital and the explanatory memorandum do not specifically support a power to legislate but merely give an assurance that the proposed measure respects fundamental rights.
- Is this result contradicted by the famous formula of Article 51(1) of the Charter, which requires the institutions and the Member States, when they implement Union law, to "respect the rights, observe the principles and promote the application thereof"? The answer is clearly no; in particular because the full text goes on to say "... promote the application thereof in accordance with their respective powers". The Charter shows therefore clearly here that the Union is under an obligation to "promote" only where it has powers to act in the first place.

2. Application of the Charter to measures taken by the Member States

- Article 51(1) of the Charter provides that it is addressed to the institutions and bodies of the Union, "and to the Member States, only when they are implementing Union law". The excellent "Explanations" of the Presidium of the Charter specify that this Article merely reproduces the case-law of the Court on this point.<sup>7</sup>

The legitimate question here is how far a Charter, integrated into the Treaties, would bind the Member States?

<sup>7</sup> The "Explanations" established by the Presidium of the Charter Convention (Document CONVENT 49, Charter 4473/00, 11 October 2000), to which this statement refers several times, give useful and important indications for a good understanding of the Charter, even if they do have no legal value. The Advocates-General at the Court of Justice already quote them when interpreting the Charter. See, for example, the opinion of the Advocate-General Mischo of 21 February 2001 in Case C-122/99 P, D v Council, quoting the point made in the "Explanations" that Article 9 of the Charter neither prohibits nor imposes the granting of marriage status to unions between persons of the same sex and concluding that this confirms the difference between a marriage and a same-sex union and that the Community legislature (acting in this case under the Staff Regulations of Officials) would not therefore be bound by the Charter to treat the two situations on the same footing.

- The Commission, as guardian of the Treaties, is well placed to answer this, because it is already regularly confronted with these problems in handling answers to citizens' complaints, infringement proceedings and requests for preliminary rulings in the Court of Justice.
- The existing case-law of the Court has acknowledged that Community fundamental rights are applicable to measures taken by the Member States – and its review of respect for these rights – in two cases only:
  - 1) when the Member State applies or implements Community law (examples: administrative measures implementing a EC agricultural Regulation; transposing a Directive) – the "Wachauf" rule;<sup>8</sup>
  - 2) when the Member State acts on the basis of a provision of derogation of the EC Treaty (such as Articles 46 and 55) allowing it to restrict the fundamental freedoms of establishment and services on grounds of public policy, public security or public health – the rule in "ERT".<sup>9</sup> The philosophy is that these derogations must themselves respect fundamental rights.
- To designate these two situations, the Court of Justice has sometimes used the admittedly rather general formula that the Member States must respect Community fundamental rights when they act "within the scope of Community law". But in practice, the Court does limit the application of this to the two situations. In particular, in Annibaldi (1997),<sup>10</sup> it held that, to make Community fundamental rights applicable, it is not enough for a Member State to act in a field, like agriculture or the environment, where the Community has powers or which are connected in one way or another with Community law; the decisive element was that the measure in question was not a specific measure transposing or implementing a Community provision.

<sup>10</sup> Judgment of 18 December 1997 in Case C-309/96 [1997] ECR I-7493.

- It is therefore important to understand that in practice the two situations referred to in the case law cover a very narrow field within the wide range of legislative and administrative measures taken by the Member States.
- This limitation is confirmed by the Charter itself, which in Article 51(1) uses the formula "when Member States implement Community law", sometimes also used by the Court of Justice,<sup>11</sup> and is more comprehensible and especially less susceptible of a broad interpretation.
- In the past the Commission has often been faced with requests to apply Community fundamental rights to the Member States. In most cases, it could immediately deny its power because it was obvious that the problem did not constitute any form of implementation of Community law (examples: the law on sects in France, the alleged violations of freedom of press in Austria or Italy, the religious freedom of Buddhist communities in Greece, the law of a Spanish autonomous Community concerning the use of a regional language).
- Some more recent cases were more delicate, because there was a certain link with Community law:
  - the alleged violation of fundamental rights by projects part-financed by the Structural Funds;
  - the issue of broadcasting licences to radio or television channels;
  - data recorded on a national identity card.

But in these cases the Commission took a very cautious line and concluded that Community scrutiny did not apply, the protection of the rights being therefore a matter to be governed by national powers. If the Charter is incorporated into the Treaties, therefore, one must think that the Commission and the Court of Justice will interpret Article 51(1) in the same way, applying it only in clear and specific cases of implementation of Community law by the Member States.

- The fear that the Charter could have an impact on broad fields of the Member States' national legislation and that the slightest indirect link with Community law or powers would suffice to make it applicable therefore strikes me as unfounded.

3. The question of "direct effect" of the Charter rights

- Certain members of the group have asked whether Charter rights, several of which are formulated as "positive duties", could have "direct effect" and be capable of being pleaded directly in the national courts. This concern relates particularly to the social Articles. I can understand their concern, but I do not believe it is warranted, for the same reasons as I mentioned a moment ago in connection with the application of the Charter to the Member States.
- The concept of "direct effect" in Community law refers to Treaty provisions which can be pleaded directly in the national courts, against national administrative authorities or even private individuals, without the need for secondary legislation to give effect to them (e.g. Article 141 of the EC Treaty on equal pay for men and women, or the four fundamental freedoms).
- But the fundamental rights under the Charter, according to Article 51(1), have limited scope: they are binding on the institutions, but they cannot normally be relied on in a national dispute against an administrative authority or against a private individual. The Charter, and particularly the social Articles, quite apart from the fact that it often provides for principles which are "to be observed" by the Community legislature without conferring subjective rights,<sup>12</sup> can therefore apply only exceptionally in the national context, namely when, as previously, there is a piece of Community legislation and a specific national measure implementing it.

4. The relationship between the Charter and its "three main sources"

a) The relationship between the Charter and the rights already enshrined in the EC Treaty

<sup>12</sup> It is clear from the Charter that a distinction is made between rights and principles [see last sentence of the preamble, and Article 51(1)]. It was also a major element for the compromise on the "social" chapter of the Charter. The approach followed in the Charter was to reflect this distinction when drafting the individual Articles. But the Convention instructed to write the Charter consciously chose not to formulate a horizontal clause distributing the Articles of the Charter into the two categories of "rights" and "principles", because it considered that the courts would be better placed to determine this case by case, having regard to developments in the academic writings. If it is now suggested that this decision should be reviewed, that is a political matter, and probably a very delicate one, rather than a legal matter.

- As you have already observed, the horizontal clause of Article 52(2) of the Charter is clear: those rights which are already enshrined in the EC Treaty and were simply reproduced in the Charter, such as citizens' rights (right to vote, to petition, to movement, etc), are governed legally by the relevant provisions of the EC Treaty. Article 52(2) is therefore a conventional referral clause.
- Admittedly, it would have been possible to restate that each of the relevant rights in the Charter applies "subject to the conditions and limits" laid down by the EC Treaty; to tell the truth, one could even have added "and the provisions for their implementation". That goes without saying, and the point is basically an aesthetic one. I quite understand the authors of the Charter, who wanted to avoid tedious repetitions. Legally, it boils down to exactly the same thing if we say it once and for all in Article 52(2).

Moreover, it is the technique used by numerous catalogues of fundamental rights in our national constitutions: the simplicity of the statement comes at a price, which is that the reader does not immediately see the full extent of the rights, including their conditions and limitations, without referring to other provisions of primary law.

- Nor do I see any legal incompatibility between the Articles of the Charter and the rights conferred by the Treaty. I will take the most commonly cited example of the relationship between Article 21(1) of the Charter and Article 13 of the Treaty, both relating to non-discrimination but formulated in different ways. The fact is that these two provisions have a very different scope and purpose: Article 13 of the Treaty creates a legal basis for legislative "anti-discrimination" measures applying as between private individuals. Article 21(1) of the Charter contains a directly applicable ban on discrimination, comparable with Article 14 of the Convention and with Protocol No 12 to it, but binding only on the Union institutions and bodies (and, of course, the Member States when they implement Union law). It is therefore logical that the Charter set forth all the non-discrimination criteria registered in Article 14 of the European Convention in order to fully respect the acquis. It is also understandable that, in the hope of providing total protection, the Charter added the criteria of Article 13 of the Treaty that are not in the European Convention.<sup>13</sup>

For example, the institutions are banned from discriminating on the basis of language (Article 21 of the Charter), as they are under the current law,<sup>14</sup> even though the Union has no power under Article 13 of the Treaty to legislate in these matters. It is difficult to see how this extremely simple situation could raise doubts as to the interpretation to be given to the legal basis of Article 13 of the EC Treaty.

- At the end of the day, I think it is very important for certainty as to the law to keep such a referral clause in Article 52(2), even if "full" incorporation of the Articles of the Charter in a new Basic Treaty (option "f") could entail a drafting change to make it clear to which legal text(s) the clause refers. The question whether or not the Charter, following incorporation into the Treaties, would have the same legal status as the Treaties is of no importance here as long as the "direction" of the referral is sufficiently clear.<sup>15</sup>

b) The Charter and the European Human Rights Convention

- Here the picture is a little more complex, as several premises have to be reconciled by the Charter:
  - first, since the Convention is a minimum standard (see Article 53), the Charter was free, like any national Constitution, to formulate rights differently, to grant better protection, in particular because of the developments in society since 1950;
  - second, there was the concern to ensure harmonious development between the two European legal orders and their two Courts;

<sup>14</sup> If it is accepted as a starting point that the Union institutions are already required by the case law of the Court of Justice to adhere to ECHR standards de facto as if it formed part of Union law, then the institutions could not practise language-based discrimination, for example, without violating Article 14 of the ECHR. This does not, of course, preclude differences in treatment which are "justified on objective grounds" for the purposes of the case-law of the Strasbourg Court, such as the organisation of a recruitment competition for officials of a specific language to meet a specific need.

<sup>15</sup> In relation both to Article 52(2) and to Article 51(2) of the Charter, the argument according that such referral clauses could not function if the Charter had a legal status equal to the Treaties (options "e" or "f") is erroneous. This point is illustrated by the fact that in the existing Treaties, there are already numerous referrals made by a part of the Treaties to others, even if all the Articles of the Treaties have identical legal status: thus, although Articles 21 and 194 and 195 of the EC Treaty on the right to petition and the right to refer a matter to the mediator are of identical legal status, it is clear that Article 21 is merely a referral clause and that the contents of the rights are actually defined by Articles 194 and 195.

- then, the importance of the principle of the autonomy of Community law;
  - and finally, the aim of reflecting and preserving in the Charter the "progress" already made in Community legislation and case law in relation to the standard of protection offered by the European Convention.
- The compromise found by the previous Convention met with a broad consensus and was also considered satisfactory by the representatives of the Council of Europe. This compromise is reflected in Article 52(3) of the Charter, which puts forward three principles:
    - first: the European Convention represents in any case a minimum standard which must be respected in the interpretation of all the Articles of the Charter;
    - second: those Articles of the Charter which were taken over from the Convention and therefore "correspond" to it have the same meaning and scope as in the European Convention. As the Explanations of the Presidium stress, the word "meaning" also naturally includes the limitations included in the various specific clauses of the Convention. Here again, out of a concern to avoid making the catalogue of rights difficult to read, the Charter preferred not to repeat all these individual clauses but to include them by reference in the horizontal clause of Article 52(3).<sup>16</sup> To me it is unthinkable that the Court of Justice might be misled on this point and deduce from the Charter, for example, that no limitation of the freedom of expression was possible in the interest of preventing crime or protecting the rights of others;
    - third: Union law can go further than the European Convention. It goes without saying for the legislature. But it also applies to certain rights of the Charter itself, which go beyond the standard of the Convention because Community law is already ahead of it. Examples include: the right to a fair trial (Article 47 Charter),<sup>17</sup> the double jeopardy rule (Article 50),<sup>18</sup> or Article

<sup>16</sup> The fact that Article 15 of the ECHR, allowing derogations from rights in the event of war or of other public dangers threatening the life of the nation, does not appear in the Charter is not problematic. The Charter does not bind the Member States in their autonomous action, and the ECHR does not therefore limit their possibilities of using the Article 15 derogation. A corresponding clause in the Charter might be thought superfluous, because national defence in the event of war and the maintenance of law and order are the responsibility of the Member States, and the Union institutions, to which the Charter is primarily addressed, have no power to take such measures or to prevent the Member States from doing so (Article 297 of the EC Treaty).

<sup>17</sup> See the judgments of the Court of Justice in Case 222/84 Johnston [1986] ECR 1651, para 18 Case 222/86 Heylens [1987] ECR 4097, para 14 and C-97/91 Borelli [1992] ECR I-6313, para 14, which recognise the "right to a fair trial" whether the case is at civil law (Article 6 of the ECHR) or public law (as the opinion of Advocate General Ruiz-Jarobo Colomer stresses in Cases C-65 and 111/95 The Queen v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex parte Shingara and Radiom [1997] ECR I-3343, para 75).

21 of the Charter, which combines the non-discrimination catalogues of both the Convention and Article 13 of the Treaty.

- Finally, the Presidium Explanations list the Charter rights which correspond, at the present time, to the European Convention. The Charter did not include this list in Article 52 itself, in order to avoid solidifying the situation and prejudging future developments in the Treaties, the secondary legislation and the case law. That seems reasonable to me; who, after all, wishes to anticipate the development of the European Convention and Union law 30 years hence?
- In light of all these elements, I really do not see how Article 52(3) could be repealed or how parts of it could be withdrawn or amended without calling into question the overall balanced solution that I have just described.

But then, of course, the question arises whether incorporating the Charter might lead to differences of case law between Strasbourg and Luxembourg: but it must be admitted that Luxembourg judgments, like judgments given by national constitutional courts, can already be contradicted by a judgment given in Strasbourg; historical instances already exist. On the other hand I know of no case where the Court of Justice disregarded an earlier judgment from Strasbourg. Having read Article 52(3) and the reference to the two Courts in the Preamble to the Charter, I think it unlikely that the Court of Justice will change its mind in the future, and the two Courts will feel that their cooperative approach has been upheld.

- Of course, Union accession to the Convention would be the ideal way of securing perfect consistency, because an applicant who felt that a Luxembourg judgment was not compatible with a Strasbourg decision could have the point checked directly; but that applies whether or not the Charter exists.

c) The Charter and common constitutional traditions

- You have also considered the status of the rights of the Charter which are not based on the Treaty or the European Convention but on the common constitutional traditions of the Member States: is the Charter sufficiently clear on those rights, bearing in mind that it contains no referral provision comparable with those concerning the Articles coming from the Treaty and from the European Convention?<sup>19</sup>
- Could we also imagine a clause referring to the "common constitutional traditions" in the horizontal clauses of the Charter?
- We could think about it. But this clause would not be easy to draft, since there is no single written text of reference for the "common constitutional traditions" but a variety of sources of inspiration. The Court of Justice has admittedly used these sources, but with a wide margin of discretion; it is illusory to believe that it could define these rights with an identical meaning and scope to those of the Constitutions of the 15, one day 27, Member States; if it tried to do so, all it could produce would be a rather mediocre lowest common denominator.
- One last point: the Court of Justice regularly refers not only to the European Human Rights Convention and the common constitutional traditions but also to other sources, and in particular to other international conventions such as the European Social Charter,<sup>20</sup> the UN International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights<sup>21</sup> and International Labour Organisation Conventions.<sup>22</sup> According to its traditional formula, it "draws inspiration from ... the guidelines supplied by

<sup>19</sup> But note that Article 52(1) of the Charter contains a rule concerning limitations of fundamental rights which accurately restates the formula used in the case law of the Court of Justice. In particular, the requirement in Article 52(1) that "the meaning and scope of those rights" should always be respected is not a "Strasbourg import" but a longstanding feature of Luxembourg case law; cf., for recent confirmation, the judgment given on 13 April 2000 in Case C-292/97 Karlsson [2000] ECR I-2737, para 45 (judgment mentioned in the Presidium Explanations).

international treaties for the protection of human rights on which the Member States have collaborated or to which they are signatories" (Opinion 2/94, para. 33).

- What matters here is that the Court of Justice does not feel inhibited from seeking inspiration in such agreements solely because certain Member States expressed reservations against them. This is normal because its case law concerns only the fundamental rights to be respected in the application of Community law and therefore leaves intact the autonomous action of the Member States. The line of the Court of Justice is in addition without alternative, since certain Member States even expressed reservations with regard to the European Convention and its protocols; the Court of Justice never agreed to implement a version of the Convention "reduced" by the amount of all the national reservations made by all the Member States to this text, which would considerably reduce the protection offered by Community fundamental rights.
- The Charter proceeded in the same way as the Court of Justice: it was inspired for example by the Convention on the Rights of the Child or Article 2 of the Protocol to the European Convention on the Right to Education, despite the reservations entered by certain Member States against them. In taking over the rights of the European Convention, it certainly could not have incorporated all the national reservations expressed by each of the fifteen Member States with regard to each Article of the Convention. However, this means neither that the Charter incorporates all these instruments as they stand in Union law<sup>23</sup> nor that it impacts on existing national reservations; these preserve their current scope, which results from the autonomous action of the individual States.

5. Summary: essential to keep the horizontal provisions

- To summarise, I have set out to show that it is very important, not to say essential, to preserve the Charter's horizontal provisions, because they are central to its comprehension and its smooth incorporation into the primary legislation. And our experience at the Commission already shows us that without these clauses it would be difficult for us to explain to citizens who write to us why the Charter does not apply in their dispute with a national authority, or why it does not replace their own Constitution.<sup>24</sup> These clauses could in theory remain the same under any mode of incorporation of the Charter which preserved it as a technically separate instrument (i.e. reference or protocol). If the Articles of the Charter were incorporated in a new Treaty or the Union Treaty, minor drafting changes would be needed in Article 51(2) and (2).

<sup>23</sup> The New York Convention on the rights of the child contains 46 Articles, but Article 24 of the Charter is merely inspired by it to formulate, in three short paragraphs, the few most fundamental elements on which there was a consensus in the "Charter" Convention, without making any reference to the New York Convention, which could have been interpreted as incorporating the Convention in the Charter without more. The same applies to the relationship between Article 3(2) of the Charter and the Oviedo Convention on human rights and biomedicine.

6. Accession to the European Convention

- Lastly, by way of codicil, I would like to add a few legal points on the subject of Union accession to the European Convention, without of course giving an opinion on the political question for or against accession.
- In my opinion, the principle of the autonomy of Community law is no legal obstacle to accession. The various arguments were well presented in CONV 116/02; in particular, review by the Strasbourg Court covers only respect for international law obligations, which the Court of Justice already admitted in Opinion 1/91 on the draft EEA agreement<sup>25</sup> (para 40: "The Community's competence in the field of international relations and its capacity to conclude international agreements necessarily entails the power to submit to the decisions of a court which is created by such an agreement as regards the interpretation and application of its provisions").
- Here I would like rather to stress the problems which arise currently from the fact that the Union is not involved in the Strasbourg system. The Member States are increasingly frequently held indirectly liable in Strasbourg in cases which really concern the Union institutions. The argument is that States could not, by transferring sovereign powers to Brussels, escape their obligations under the Convention.

<sup>24</sup> It seems that it is especially for this kind of political and symbolic reasons that Article 53 of the Charter stresses that it neither limits nor affects human rights recognised, in their respective fields of application, by international conventions and the Member States' constitutions. At the same time, the formula "in their respective fields of application" in Article 53 of the Charter makes it possible to exclude any interpretation of this clause jeopardising the principle of the primacy of Community law, because it follows precisely from the case-law of the Court relating to this principle that provisions of national law which conflict with a provision of Community law (including the Charter incorporated in the Treaties) in a given case in point cannot be applied. See J.-P. Jacqué, in Revue universelle des droits de l'homme, 2000, No 1/2, p. 49.

- This reasoning is already recognised by the Strasbourg Court for provisions of primary law<sup>26</sup> and for the indirect control of Directives.<sup>27</sup> Currently, in Senator Lines, a case pending in Strasbourg, the 15 Member States are required to defend themselves against an application which concerns exclusively a Commission competition Decision upheld by the Court of Justice.<sup>28</sup> Admittedly the Member States, and the Commission as "third party"(!), pleaded that the application was inadmissible, but it is not certain that the Strasbourg Court will in future refrain from any form of review. In all these cases, it is problematic that the Strasbourg Court has to rule indirectly on Union measures without the Union being able to defend itself and without its legal system being represented by a judge in the Court.
- Finally, some have expressed concern that accession to the European Convention might create new Union powers as regards fundamental rights, as the EC or the Union would be a contracting party and could therefore take part in negotiations for amendments to the Convention. This question is easily settled: the status of contracting party to the Convention does not inevitably mean that the Union would acquire general power as regards fundamental rights, including for legislation at internal level. The aim of EC or Union accession being only to submit the institutions to the fundamental rights of the Convention and to external review by the Strasbourg Court, it is not obvious how a legal basis in the Treaty confined to this end would create such a general power. In any case, techniques to clarify that a legal basis in the Treaties allowing accession does not have this side-effect are easy to devise. An example might be a statement – similar to that made in the context of the Convention on the Law of the Sea – clarifying that the powers of the EC/EU are limited.
- In any case, straightforward EU/EC accession to the Convention appears by far preferable to the alternatives that have sometimes been put forward.<sup>29</sup> In particular, only accession by the EU/EC as a contracting party to the Convention would give it the same rights as the other parties to participate in the legal system in Strasbourg (in particular to elect a full-time rather than just an

This would reflect the fact that the Community (or the Union in future) has separate legal personality from the Member States and that it has developed its own legal order which must be represented in the judicial system of Strasbourg.<sup>30</sup> On the other hand, the hypothesis of a special status, with the EC/EU institutions subject to review by the Strasbourg Court without the Community or the Union acceding formally to the Convention as a contracting party, is questionable: would a such regime guarantee adequate representation and participation of the EU/EC in the Strasbourg system? And would it even be compatible with the nature of the review by the Strasbourg Court, which extends only to respect for international law obligations by the contracting parties?<sup>31</sup> problematic for a number of reasons, in particular because it would considerably delay the resolution of disputes.

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS

Subject: Meeting of the Praesidium
Brussels, 11 September 2002

I. POINTS SETTLED*1. Handling of the Plenary session of 12-13 September

The President informed the Praesidium of the opening statement that he intended to make stressing that there are two parallel exercises, simplification of treaties and simplification of instruments and procedures, recalling the working method with the building blocks emerging from the Working Groups' reports, and confirming that the Praesidium would put forward at the end of October a first draft for a Treaty framework.

In this perspective and given the advanced stage of the work of the Amato Working Group on Legal Personality, it was agreed that Mr. Amato would give at this session an oral presentation, after the presentation by M. Mendez de Vigo of the likely report of his Working Group on Subsidiarity, and that both Working Groups' reports would be debated in the Plenary session on 3-4 October.

2. Work programme and calendar for 2003

The Praesidium approved the work programme for the Autumn as set out in Annex, Mrs Stuart having agreed that her Working Group on National Parliaments could complete its work on the new, accelerated timing. There would thus be two one-day Plenary debates on Working Group reports at each remaining session this year. The Praesidium however thought it best not to circulate the work programme to the Convention at this stage: the President would instead describe it, up to end October in his opening remarks.

The Praesidium approved the revised calendar for 2003, which was then circulated to the Convention (doc. CONV 262/02).

3. Working Groups

a) Composition

The lists of members of the four new Working Groups were approved and then circulated to the Convention (see doc. CONV 243/02).

b) “Final product” of Working Groups

It was agreed that Working Groups should produce synthetic reports containing recommendations or options, as precise as possible, but should refrain from drafting Treaty articles, since, in order to ensure consistency, those should only be drafted by the Praesidium in the light of the outcome of Plenary debates on all the building blocks, as well as on the Treaty framework.

II. OUTSTANDING QUESTIONS

4. Treaty simplification

The Praesidium continued its discussion about Treaty simplification. It agreed to pursue this issue at its next meetings with a view to the establishment of its first draft of a Treaty framework. The meeting of 17 October would start at 9 a.m. and end around 2 p.m., and would be held at Val Duchesse.

Next meeting will take place on 26 September at 15h00.

SPEAKING NOTE

of Judge Vassilios Skouris

Hearing of 17 September 2002

INTRODUCTION

1. The Court of Justice attaches great importance to respect for fundamental rights within the Community legal order and follows the work of your Group with great interest. That is why I am happy to have an opportunity of answering your questions today.

2. However, I have to point out that, even though there have been some discussions within the Court on certain questions covered by your Group in its work, those discussions have not yet given rise to an official position on the part of the Court. Consequently my replies to your questions must be taken as representing my own views, not necessarily those of the Court.

3. In dealing with the written questions that have been submitted to me, I have decided to arrange them in the following three groups:

- a first group concerns the impact of the integration of the Charter of fundamental rights of the European Union into the (future) Treaty;

- a second group concerns the consequences if the EC (i.e. the EU) decides to accede to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR) or, on the other hand, decides not to accede;

- a third group concerns a possible improvement in judicial protection so as to give full respect for fundamental rights within the Community legal order irrespective of the outcome of the discussions on integrating the Charter into the Treaty or whether the EU accedes to the ECHR.

I. THE EFFECTS OF INTEGRATING THE CHARTER INTO THE (FUTURE) TREATY

The written questions in this area that have been submitted to me concern the following three points:

(a) the impact of the integration of the Charter into the Treaty on the allocation of powers between the EU and the Member States (Mr van der Linde, first part of the second question);

(b) the impact of the integration of the Charter on the current wording of Article 230. Should a right of action be provided for individuals (natural persons or NGOs) against a regulatory act that infringes a fundamental right? (Mr Ben Fayot, second question);

(c) the impact of the integration of the Charter on court rulings in the context of the third pillar in cases brought by individuals (Mr Ben Fayot, third question).

(a) I do not believe that the integration of the Charter into the Treaty will alter the allocation of powers between the EU and the Member States if an appropriate amendment is also introduced into the horizontal clauses in Articles 51(2) and 52 (2) of the Charter.

On this point I refer to the views put forward by Mr Vitorino in Working Document No 9 of 18 July 2002 (see Working Document No 9, 1-3 and 5-6).

(b) My observations on this point break down into the following two classes:

- regarding the law as it stands: the Court of Justice in its judgment of 25 July 2002 in Case C-50/00 P Unión de Pequeños Agricultores ruled that the current arrangements for judicial review of the lawfulness of the acts of the institutions are in accordance with the general principles of law, which include fundamental rights. However, it also indicated that, while it is admittedly possible to envisage a system of judicial review of the legality of Community measures different from that established by the founding Treaty, it is for the legislature to introduce any reform of this nature;

-regarding the reforms that might be introduced: I have to observe that, as our legal cultures and traditions show, historically all recognition and embodiment of a substantive right has always been accompanied by a procedural counterpart, i.e. a remedy to protect that right. It is therefore reasonable to foresee that the integration of the Charter into the Treaty will produce the same effect and bring about a change in the current rules. The risk of increasing the number of cases brought before the Court cannot form a criterion for determining whether to change those rules. In any event this risk would exist even if the current rules were maintained despite the integration of the Charter into the Treaty. If individuals do not enjoy a direct right of action against acts of the Community, it is very likely that there will be a considerable increase in the number of references made for preliminary rulings on the validity of those acts.

I will now consider the approach we should take here.

It has often been suggested that a Community Verfassungsbeschwerde should be introduced. I do not feel this is the best solution. First, in practice it is difficult to draw a clear distinction between grounds of action relating to the protection of fundamental rights and other grounds of action for challenging the lawfulness of a Community act. Second, determining the court with jurisdiction to take cognisance of a Community Verfassungsbeschwerde would remain an issue. With any jurisdiction other than the Court of Justice, there would be reason to fear a conflict of jurisdiction. If the Court of Justice were to have jurisdiction, the introduction of a new remedy would complicate and lengthen the procedure before it.

Nor do I feel it is desirable to resolve this difficulty by granting individuals the right to challenge rules simply because there is no appropriate remedy at national level. As the Court of Justice has pointed out in its judgment in Unión de Pequeños Agricultores, at paragraph 43, a major stumbling block with that approach is that it requires the Court to be judge and interpreter of national procedural rules, which would go beyond its jurisdiction when reviewing the legality of Community measures.

Lastly, I would like to point out (and here I am replying more or less directly to the second question put by Mr Ben Fayot) that, if Article 230 were to be amended to allow individuals a direct right of action to challenge a Community rule, it would be impossible to restrict the initiation of actions solely to cases where there has been an infringement of a fundamental right. This is so because, as I have already pointed out, the experience with Germany has shown that it is impossible in practice to distinguish the grounds for that action for annulment from the other grounds available under Article 230. It follows that any amendment to Article 230 would have to allow individuals a direct right of action before the Court of Justice to challenge a provision on all of the grounds made available in Article 230, obviously including the ground of infringement of a fundamental right.

(c) I can be relatively brief regarding the last point, the impact the integration of the Charter would have on the review by the Court of Justice of decisions adopted within the context of the third pillar. Although it is desirable that there should be uniform conditions for the Court in carrying out a judicial review of the acts of the institutions irrespective of the field in which they have been adopted, it is not appropriate for a Member of the Court to put forward suggestions to the constituent on this issue. In any event, it is difficult to accept that, if the Charter becomes binding law or if the EU accedes to the ECHR, it will be possible to maintain the restricted judicial review provided for within the context of the third pillar.

II. THE CONSEQUENCES IF THE EU DECIDES TO ACCEDE TO THE ECHR OR OTHERWISE

The questions that have been put to me on this issue involve the following four points:

(a) the impact of an accession to the ECHR on the allocation of powers between the EU and the Member States (Mr van der Linden, first part of the second question);

(b) whether the accession would involve a conflict with the autonomy of Community law (Mr Vitorino, third question) and what its consequences would be for the current role of the Court of Justice (Mr van der Linden, first and third questions, Mr Ben Fayot, first question);

(c) whether a "functional accession" would create difficulties (Mr van der Linden, fourth question);

(d) whether a problem would be created by double standards of protection of fundamental rights if the EU did not accede to the ECHR (Mr van der Linden, fifth question).

(a) In keeping with what I have already said on the integration of the Charter into the Treaty, I do not think that the allocation of powers between the EU and the Member States will be affected if the EU accedes to the ECHR provided that the legal basis to be introduced into the Treaty is restricted solely to resolving the issue of the accession to the ECHR, for example by amending Article 303 of the EC Treaty.

(b) There will not in general be a conflict involving the autonomy of the Community legal order if the EU accedes to the ECHR. All the rules of Community law, with the exception of those of the ECHR, will continue to be adopted by the Community institutions and applied by the EU administration or the authorities of the Member States. Moreover, the application and interpretation of those rules will remain within the jurisdiction of the national courts and the Court of Justice, as is laid down in the Treaty as it stands. However, with respect to the matters covered by the ECHR, accession will represent a limitation to the autonomy of Community law. Regarding the Court of Justice in particular, it will effectively lose its sole right to deliver a final ruling on the legality of Community acts where a violation of a right guaranteed by the ECHR is at issue. In my view, there is nothing shocking in this: the position is the same when the constitutional courts or supreme courts of Member States test the constitutionality or legality of acts within their domestic legal systems.

Moreover, I do not feel that, as has been argued in some quarters, settling disputes involving the validity of a Community act for infringement of a fundamental right would allow the European Court of Human Rights to determine other issues of Community law, particularly those involving the allocation of powers between the Union and the Member States. In any case, technical solutions have been proposed (see CONV 116/02 of 18 June 2002, p. 22, footnote 2) to avoid such a situation, if fears exist that this might be the outcome (a mechanism allowing the EU to intervene on behalf of a Member State and vice versa, acting as joint defendant with joint and several liability, and a declaration to be lodged emphasising that only the EU and the Member States are entitled to determine the allocation of powers in accordance with their own internal procedures).

I should point out that the prospects of an external control, carried out by the European Court of Human Rights in cases where national and Community remedies have been exhausted, can only intensify the European Court of Justice's own control of fundamental rights. The risk of conflicts between decisions of the Court of Justice and of the European Court of Human Rights must not be over-estimated. The Court of Justice has always paid close attention to the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights and will naturally continue to do so; my view is that this makes the risk very small. When new issues arise that are not covered by the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, the Court of Justice will have to settle them appropriately itself.

For those reasons I think that if the EU becomes a party to the ECHR it will be unnecessary to determine the respective roles of the Court of Justice and of the European Court of Human Rights or to regulate relations between the two courts, even if the Charter becomes binding law. The suggestion that the Court of Justice should refer such cases to the European Court of Human Rights would involve an unreasonable complication and slow down the procedure for the former court, the more so if the reference to the European Court of Human Rights were made in the context of a reference for a preliminary ruling to the Court of Justice.

(c) The remarks I have made concerning a pure and simple accession to the ECHR also apply to the hypothesis of a "functional accession" as advocated by Mr Piris in his intervention in your Group (Working document No 13, p. 37).

(d) Lastly, if the EU does not become a party to the ECHR, it is impossible to exclude that a double standard of protection will develop as a result of the different, or even conflicting, rulings given by the Court of Justice and the European Court of Human Rights. Even though such an occurrence will be relatively rare because, as I have explained, the Court of Justice follows the rulings of the European Court of Human Rights closely, it is impossible to exclude it entirely given the absence of an external control by the Court of Strasbourg.

III. IMPROVEMENT OF THE SYSTEM OF JUDICIAL PROTECTION

In this section I shall discuss the following two points:

(a) the approach of the Court of Justice to the constitutional traditions common to the Member States (Mr Vitorino, first question) and the issues that will arise if the Charter is integrated (amendment of Article 6(2) of the Treaty on European Union; introduction of a horizontal clause into the Charter for rights that are not based on the EC Treaty or the ECHR);

(b) the improvements that could be introduced into the judicial review to provide greater protection for fundamental rights in the context of the current three pillars of the European Union (Mr Vitorino, second question).

(a) According to the settled case-law of the Court of Justice, as most recently embodied in its judgment in Case C-50/00 P Unión de Pequeños Agricultores (paragraphs 38 and 39), fundamental rights form an integral part of the general principles of law that are upheld by the Court of Justice. In discerning those general principles of law, the Court is guided by the constitutional traditions that are common to the Member States. It should be borne in mind that common constitutional traditions do not form a direct source of Community law and the Court of Justice is not bound by them as such; they constitute a source of inspiration for it in discerning and defining the scope of the general principles of law that apply in the Community legal order. It follows that it is not the Court's duty to discern, and, as it were, mechanically transpose into the Community legal order, the lowest common denominator of constitutional traditions common to the Member States. The Court draws inspiration from those traditions in order to determine the level of protection appropriate within the Community legal order and for that very reason appreciates them more freely.

This approach has enabled the Court of Justice to provide a high level of protection for fundamental rights. It suffices to indicate at this point that, if the Court had determined to adopt the common denominator of the constitutional traditions common to all Member States, it could not have recognised and protected within the Community legal order the right to pursue a trade or business,<sup>1</sup> which, I understand, is recognised and protected only by the German Constitution.

However, the issue arises whether, if the Charter is integrated into the Treaty, it will still be necessary to refer to the common constitutional traditions and to the ECHR in order to discern the general principles of law, as is laid down in Article 6(2) of the Treaty on European Union.

My feeling is that, from the point when the EU develops a binding set of fundamental rights, it will no longer be necessary to refer to the general principles of law and consequently to the common constitutional traditions and the ECHR as a parallel or "concurrent and equivalent" source for fundamental rights; these will merely form a subsidiary and complementary source. Accordingly, the Court of Justice would have recourse to the general principles of law only in order to make good any lacunae in the text of the Charter. In my view, a consequential amendment would have to be introduced into Article 6(2) of the Treaty on European Union.

(b) Regarding the improvements that might be desirable for the arrangements on judicial review for the full protection of legal protection of fundamental rights within the context of the current three pillars of the Union, I would refer, with regard to consideration of any amendment to Article 230, to the observations I have set out on this point in the first section of my talk.

In conclusion, I can only repeat my point that, although it is desirable to attain uniformity in the protection provided by the Court within the context of the current three pillars, it is not appropriate for a Member of the Court to put forward suggestions on this matter to the constituent .

The fourth meeting of Working Group II (Charter/ECHR) was held on 17 September 2002 between 10.00 and 13.00 and between 14.30 and 18.30, and was chaired by Commissioner António Vitorino.

- I. Modalities and consequences of possible accession by the EC/EU to the ECHR
– First debate (see CONV 116/02, Part III)

All speakers expressed their support for accession by the European Union (given the Convention's general approach of enshrining a single legal personality for the Union) to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) or, at the very least, emphasised the arguments in favour of such an accession. In particular, it was said that accession would guarantee citizens the same degree of protection of fundamental rights as they enjoy already vis-à-vis Member States, that the arguments for accession could be even stronger in the case of a binding Charter, as it would help to ensure the harmonious development of the case-law of the two European Courts, and that it would serve as a link between the "core" and the "wider" Europe by preserving the political importance of the Council of Europe in this area.

A majority of speakers stressed the fact that accession to the ECHR should not be an alternative to incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties, but rather a complementary step, adding to the protection afforded by the Charter and the Court of Justice, with the external control provided by the European Court. The situation would then be similar to that of the law of all the Member States, which guarantee fundamental rights on the one hand by their Constitutions, and which have subscribed, on the other, to the international minimum standard set by the ECHR.

Two matters which require particular attention in this respect were, however, raised. On the one hand, several members emphasised that accession to the ECHR should not lead to an extension in Union competence in the area of human rights. In this respect, a number of speakers were satisfied that a legal basis in the Treaty confined to authorising the Union to accede to the ECHR could not have this effect; others felt that thought should in any case be given to technical solutions to rule out such an effect entirely. On the other hand, it was emphasised that accession should be without prejudice to national positions arising from the fact that certain Member States had not ratified all the Protocols annexed to the ECHR or had entered reservations on it.

At the end of the general discussion (which continued after the hearing of Mr Fischbach – see below – at the beginning of the afternoon), the Chairman concluded by pointing out the need to see the several layers to the issue: the Convention's task would be confined to examining the incorporation into the Treaty of a constitutional authorisation for the Union to accede to the ECHR. At this stage, it should be clarified that that would not lead to an extension of competence. Furthermore, there was a need to ensure compatibility between accession and incorporation of the Charter as a binding text; for that purpose, it seemed necessary to maintain Article 52(3) in the Charter. However, the question of to which Additional Protocols to the ECHR the Union should accede and what possible reservations it would enter upon accession to the ECHR, would not be of a constitutional nature and should not be addressed by the Convention; it would instead be the Council which could take a decision by unanimity at the appropriate time on the basis of the authorisation. The national reservations entered by Member States would in any case remain intact in the event of accession, as they concerned the implementation of national law, while the effect of accession was confined to the field of Union law.

In this context, the Chairman was sceptical with regard to the "functional accession" model, which was mentioned by a Group member but rejected by others (such a model would involve the negotiation, between Member States and the States of the Council of Europe, of special protocols to the ECHR and to the EC/EU Treaty under which the Union institutions would be subject to control by the European Court without the EC/EU itself acceding to the ECHR with its own legal personality (see explanation in CONV 116/02, pp. 25 and 26). The Chairman emphasised that he saw no advantage in the model, which was not envisaged by the Member States' legal experts meeting in the Council of Europe's CDDH (Steering Committee for Human Rights). Such a model instead presented disadvantages, as highlighted by Judge Fischbach, resulting in particular from the Union's absence from the Strasbourg system.

2. Hearing of Mr March Fischbach, Judge, European Court of Human Rights

The Group heard Mr Marc Fischbach, Judge at the European Court of Human Rights, who spoke in a personal capacity. In response to questions put by Group members, Mr Fischbach made, inter alia, the following comments:

Mr Fischbach felt that EC/EU accession to the ECHR would not affect the autonomy of Union law. The European Court's remit was confined to giving rulings on compliance with obligations arising from the ECHR. The Court did not interpret the national law of the contracting States; neither, therefore, would it intervene in the interpretation of Union law, for which the Court of Justice would remain the supreme arbiter. As for acts of contracting States, in the event of infringement of the ECHR, the Court would neither have the competence to annul Union acts, nor to prescribe or suggest specific measures to remedy the infringement observed, as the choice of remedy should only be for the institutions of the Union. Furthermore, in accordance with the subsidiarity principle, the European Court took care, in the application of the ECHR to specific cases, to leave Contracting Parties appropriate leeway, which would also enable them to take into account the specific nature of Union law.

The relationship between the European Court of Human Rights and the Court of Justice of the EC could not therefore in the case of accession be qualified in terms of a "hierarchy" between the two European Courts, as each of the two Courts would only give rulings within its own jurisdiction, without impinging on that of the other; the European Court would simply act as a more specialised jurisdiction exercising additional external control only with regard to compliance with the ECHR. Its role would leave the authority and importance of the Court of Justice fully intact, just as it did not reduce those of the national constitutional and supreme courts, which were very respectful of fundamental rights and were also free to exceed the minimum standard set by the ECHR.

Mr Fischbach believed that Union accession to the ECHR, which would enable the Court of Justice to apply the ECHR directly, could also reinforce the Court of Justice's role in developing the protection of fundamental rights in Europe and lead to increased influence for the Court over the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights.

While it seemed important to define the role of the Court of Justice in a future constitutional treaty of the Union, Mr Fischbach saw no reason, even in the case of accession to the ECHR, to reserve an express place for the European Court in the treaty, since the European Court is an institution outside Union law.

Mr Fischbach was satisfied with the current wording of Article 52(3) of the Charter and emphasised the importance of the wording, on the basis of which the Council of Europe observers were able to express their satisfaction with the text of the Charter in the previous Convention. He confirmed his view that the legal principles arising from this clause were sufficiently clear. Implementation would not for all that be without some difficulties, but these were inherent in any effort to ensure harmonious development of the case-law of the two Courts and therefore existed before the Charter. They could, however, increase further with the gradual extension of Union competence to areas which were especially sensitive in terms of fundamental rights, particularly under the third pillar. In the face of such difficulties, which could arise now, in particular when the Court of Justice had to give a ruling before European Court case-law was formed on a particular matter, Union accession to the ECHR would work as a "safety net", making it possible to minimise possible case-law discrepancies and correct the effects. This solution seemed all the more advisable since incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties would mean that the number of cases brought before the Court of Justice and affecting fundamental rights was likely to increase following accession, as would the number of cases brought before the European Court. Mr Fischbach felt, however, that this increase, and the practical difficulties it could create, should not make us lose sight of the fact that they were merely the consequence of strengthened protection of fundamental rights. This strengthening would – because it took place under external control – help lend greater credibility to the Union system.

Mr Fischbach believed that Union accession to the ECHR would not in any way alter the allocation of competence between the Union and its Member States. Considering the competences to be a fact, the Strasbourg system would accept that allocation as it stood, as an internal matter for the Union and its Member States; the European Court would not intervene, as it was exclusively a matter of Union law. To resolve specific cases brought before the European Court and in which it was not certain whether the Union or one of its Member States was responsible for an alleged infringement of the ECHR, Mr Fischbach referred to a "co-defender" mechanism developed by the Council of Europe's Steering Committee for Human Rights (CDDH) (see working document No 8 by Mr Vitorino). By virtue of this mechanism, a defendant Member State would be able to invite the Union to join the proceedings as "co-defendant" if it felt that the case involved the Union's responsibility, and vice versa. In the case of infringement of the ECHR, the European Court's ruling would be given in respect of the two defendants taken together, without ruling on the allocation of responsibility between the two. Similarly, when complying with the judgment, it would be for the Union and the Member States alone to determine the allocation of responsibility between the Union and the defendant State.

Mr Fischbach had reservations concerning suggestions to introduce a referral or consultation procedure between the European Court and the Court of Justice, either in the case of accession or as an alternative to it. Among the disadvantages of such approaches, he mentioned in particular the considerable extension of deadlines for rulings in pending cases and the resulting imbalance which would be created between the Union and Member States, where supreme courts were not able to consult the European Court. Mr Fischbach also confirmed that informal information meetings were also held regularly between the European Court and the Court of Justice, but that he felt it was neither necessary nor appropriate to introduce consultation between the Courts with the aim of enabling the two Courts to agree on or influence each other on the rulings to be given on pending cases.

Mr Fischbach was asked about the suggestion to consider a "functional" accession (i.e. the negotiation, between the Member States and the States of the Council of Europe, of special protocols to the ECHR and to the EC/EU Treaty under which the Union institutions would be subject to control by the European Court without the EC/EU itself acceding to the ECHR with its own legal personality). He was unsure as to the advantages of the idea, feeling that it would be the source of disadvantages and complications, since it seemed so difficult to reconcile with the principles governing the Strasbourg system, particularly that of the collective guarantee. If the Union as such were not part of the system, there would be no Court judge elected on behalf of the Union and as a "representative" of Union law. However, in the Convention system, the presence of a "national" judge was essential, as it provided Court proceedings with expertise in the law challenged by the action. Such expertise was all the more crucial in the case of Union accession, in view of the specific nature of Community/Union law and the need to ensure harmonious development of this law with the ECHR. The absence in the Court of a judge elected on behalf of the Union could, therefore, cause a problem with regard to the authority and legitimacy of rulings against the Union. By the same token, in the case of "functional" accession, there would be no Union representation in the Committee of Ministers when it monitored compliance with rulings, even though such representation was necessary in order to exercise this function and, in the particular case of the Union, should also serve to inform the Committee on the Union's limited competences (see previous point).

3. Incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties:

– examination of certain technical adjustments to the horizontal provisions of the Charter

With regard to possible adjustments to Article 51(1) and (2), a consensus emerged in favour of recommending slight adjustments along the lines given in working document No 14 by Mr MacCormick and in the hearing of Mr Piris (see document No 13), in order to clarify beyond the slightest doubt that a Charter incorporated into the Treaties would not alter the allocation of competences between the Union and Member States.

By the same token, there was a consensus to keep a referral clause governing all Charter rights taken from the EC Treaty. The definitive wording of the referral clause, currently found in Article 52(2) of the Charter, could not be determined at this stage as it would depend on the architecture of the constitutional treaty to be drawn up by the Convention.

With regard to Article 52(3) of the Charter, it was requested that the meaning to be given to this provision and in particular the relationship between the first and second sentences be clarified in the final report. In this respect, some members of the Group, as well as the Chairman in his conclusion, indicated that if, in accordance with Article 52(3) of the Charter, the meaning and scope of the rights of the Charter corresponding to the rights of the ECHR were the same as those provided for in the Convention, the addition of the second sentence of Article 52(3) of the Charter was necessary to clarify that this Article did not prevent higher protection being afforded by Union legislation, as well as by the provisions of the Charter, which, although based on the ECHR, went further than it because the Union acquis was already an improvement on the ECHR (examples: Articles 47 and 50 of the Charter).

Lastly, it was requested that the Group seek to formulate an additional clause in Article 52 of the Charter which was currently lacking and which would govern those Articles of the Charter not taken from the Treaties or from the ECHR. It was thought that such a clause could be based on Court of Justice case-law relating to the constitutional traditions of Member States and also accentuate the distinction made in the Charter between rights and principles.

While, in response to that request, some members were generally prepared to examine ways of finding a formula concerning the relationship between the Charter and the constitutional traditions common to the Member States, a number of other speakers were not convinced of the existence of a lacuna in the horizontal provisions, pointing out in particular that the Charter was clearer than the source of constitutional traditions could ever be, that a referral clause would not be possible since there was no reference text, other than the Charter, which would summarise common constitutional traditions, and that it would be inadmissible to wish to change the meaning of the Charter by inserting an additional horizontal clause. The Chairman, concluding on this point, was open to seeking a solution. He stressed, however, that there was no room for conflict with the current practice of the Court, described by Judge Skouris, of basing itself freely on common constitutional traditions by rejecting the approach of the lowest common denominator. He added that it was also necessary to bear in mind fundamental rights based on other sources such as other legal instruments and that, while the difference between rights and principles was well established in the Charter, the previous Convention had decided not to stipulate in detail the legal consequences of the distinction but rather to leave it to case-law.

Some members requested that the Group's report also give a position on the usefulness of emphasising the importance of the explanations of the Praesidium in relation to the text of the Charter when it was incorporated.

4. Hearing of Mr Vassilios Skouris, Judge, Court of Justice of the EC

In his introductory presentation (see working document No 19) and in response to the questions put by the members of the Group, Mr Skouris – who spoke in a personal capacity, explaining that the Court had held some discussions on the matters concerning the Group but that no official position had yet been adopted – made, inter alia, the following comments:

Mr Skouris felt that incorporation of the Charter could not alter the allocation of competences between the Union and the Member States if care were taken to adjust properly the horizontal clauses of Articles 51(2) and 52(2) of the Charter as proposed in the Group.

Mr Skouris said that de lege lata the Court had recently ruled that the current system of appeals procedures for scrutinising the legality of acts of the institutions complied with the general principles of law. He added that de lege ferenda a modification of the current system could be envisaged. Judge Skouris felt that the establishment of a Community "Verfassungsbeschwerde" (special constitutional appeal) would not be the most suitable solution; neither would it be desirable to allow individuals to challenge a regulatory act only when there was no appropriate appeals procedure at national level. If an amendment were to be considered, it would be in Article 230(4) TEC, the strictness of which had been criticised, rather than in Article 234 TEC, as the preliminary referral procedure was working satisfactorily. Judge Skouris also specified that while the European Ombudsman fulfilled an extremely respected role, he was not a judicial body and could hardly therefore take on a role of "filtering" by submitting individual cases to the Court of Justice. Lastly, Mr Skouris considered it desirable that the conditions for Court control be uniform with regard to acts of the institutions, irrespective of the subject concerned, and that it would not be easy to accept that, in the case of either a binding Charter or accession to the ECHR, the restricted judicial control provided for under the third pillar be maintained, while emphasising that it was not for him as a judge to give the constituent authority suggestions on the matter.

Mr Skouris confirmed that accession to the ECHR did not, generally speaking, conflict with the autonomy of Community law. It would come as no shock to him if, following accession, the Court of Justice lost its monopoly over ruling on infringement of the ECHR by a Community act. Mr Skouris regarded the interpretation sometimes given of Court Opinion No 2/94 as a misunderstanding; in reality, the Court would have no problem with the external control which accession to the ECHR would establish.

Mr Skouris did not believe that EC/EU accession to the ECHR would affect the allocation of competences between the EC/EU and its Member States if the legal basis established for that purpose was confined to governing only the problem of accession. He felt that the Strasbourg Court would not, following accession, be asked to rule on other matters of Community law such as those affecting the allocation of competences; he referred to the technical solutions proposed to avoid such a situation.

Mr Skouris considered it necessary not to overestimate the risk of possible contradiction between the decisions of the two European Courts, given that the Court of Justice had always been, and would continue to be, very watchful of the Strasbourg Court's case-law. For that reason, Mr Skouris would not advocate setting out the respective roles of the two Courts in the treaty nor regulating the relations between them, even in the case of incorporation of the Charter; in this connection, Mr Skouris was opposed to introducing a referral by the Court of Justice to the Strasbourg Court, as it would make the procedure before the Court disproportionately complicated and cumbersome.

Mr Skouris confirmed that the Court based itself on the constitutional traditions common to the Member States in order to identify the general principles of law with regard to fundamental rights. He emphasised that common constitutional traditions did not constitute a direct source of Community law and so did not bind the Court as such; they were more a source of inspiration. It was not, therefore, a question of the Court identifying and mechanically transposing the lowest common denominator of the constitutional traditions common to the Member States into Community law, but rather of it drawing inspiration from them in a broader sense to establish the level of protection appropriate to the Community's legal order. In the case of incorporation of the Charter, Mr Skouris felt that there should no longer be recourse to general principles, and consequently the common constitutional traditions, as a "concurrent and equivalent" source of fundamental rights, but rather purely as a subsidiary and complementary source, enabling the Court to use it solely for the purposes of making good any lacunae in the text of the Charter.

Mr Skouris felt that Article 52(3) of the Charter, incorporated into the Treaty, would confirm the current Court of Justice practice of following the interpretation given to the ECHR by the European Court of Human Rights, and should not lead to a change in that satisfactory practice of the Court of Justice. With regard to Article 52(2) of the Charter, Mr Skouris believed that it identified the principle according to which rights already enshrined in the EC Treaty and taken up by the Charter would be governed by the EC Treaty as lex specialis and that existing case-law concerning those rights would remain in force. When questioned in general terms about whether the Charter was clearly enough worded, Mr Skouris replied that while there was always room for improvement, he could live with the current text of the Charter and that, while the current situation would undoubtedly give the Court of Justice greater freedom, he personally would feel more comfortable working with a written regulatory framework of fundamental rights as provided by the Charter.

The fifth meeting of Working Group II (Charter/ECHR) was held on 4 October 2002 between 14.30 and 17.30 under the chairmanship of Commissioner Antonio Vitorino.

1. Effective judicial remedies and access to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for individuals

The Chairman drew the Group's attention to working document No 21, which summarised the question of judicial remedies and access to the Court of Justice for individuals on the basis of a number of proposals by members of the Working Group and other members of the Convention, in the context of the fundamental right to effective judicial protection. He pointed out that although the subject was linked to the general topic of fundamental rights, it was a separate issue from incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties or Union accession to the ECHR.

First of all the Group heard a presentation by the European Ombudsman, Mr Jacob Söderman, a Convention Observer, on his proposals for articles on remedies (judicial and other) for inclusion in the constitutional treaty (see CONV 221/02 CONTRIB 76). Mr Söderman suggested, amongst other things, that the treaty should place a duty on Member States – such as that which the Court of Justice had already deduced from Article 10 TEC – to ensure that their national courts provided effective protection for rights guaranteed by Union law. In addition, he proposed that the Ombudsman be empowered to bring proceedings concerning fundamental rights in the Court of Justice, and that a legal basis be established for harmonising common European principles of administrative law.

The Group's discussions focussed on the three options set out in the Chairman's working document No 21.

The vast majority of speakers were against creating a new judicial procedure specially for the protection of fundamental rights (along the lines of the "Verfassungsbeschwerde" or the "recurso de amparo", option "A" in working document No 21). It was pointed out that if the Charter were incorporated into the constitutional treaty, the legal remedies currently offered by the Union system through the fourth paragraph of Article 230 and through Article 234 TEC would also become available to Union citizens in respect of their rights under the Charter, which would be of great benefit in the protection of fundamental rights.

Some members commented that there were gaps in judicial protection, resulting in particular from the condition laid down in the fourth paragraph of Article 230 TEC that the disputed act had to be not only of direct but also individual concern to the applicant. These members therefore proposed limited redrafting of the fourth paragraph of Article 230 TEC in order to rectify these omissions (option "B" in working document No 21). Criticism was also levelled at the limitations on the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice in the current "3rd pillar" and the lack of protection against the acts of Union bodies such as Europol.

There were on the other hand a number of speakers who, while not denying that the current system did have a few shortcomings, were generally satisfied with the way it was working and warned against any major overhaul, in particular of the current "division of labour" between national and Community courts. In particular, major changes might mean a substantially increased caseload for the Court of Justice, which would probably lead to longer procedural delays and thus prejudice the effective protection of citizens' rights. In a spirit of subsidiarity, some speakers expressed interest in the possibility that the Treaty might place a duty on Member States to provide effective legal remedies at national level in defence of rights guaranteed by Union law (option "C" in document No 21).

In conclusion, the Chairman felt that the question of revision of the fourth paragraph of Article 230 TEC and its institutional implications needed to be considered at the same time as other issues such as the limits on the Court's jurisdiction in matters affecting justice and home affairs or judicial review of subsidiarity. The Chairman's view was that the Group should not make any specific recommendations but should draw the Convention's attention to the issue and to the various contributions which members had made, for consideration in an appropriate context.

The sixth meeting of Working Group II (Charter/ECHR) was held on 7 October 2002 between 10.00 and 16.30, and was chaired by Commissioner Antonio Vitorino.

1. Modalities and consequences of possible accession by the EC/EU to the ECHR

The Chairman introduced this item by stating that his draft of the Group's report would follow the lines given in his oral statement to the plenary on 3 October. In particular, he proposed underscoring in the report the following two points:

- Accession to the ECHR would not result in any change to the allocation of competences between the Union and the Member States. The Group might recommend the use of certain tools to ensure this result, such as the insertion of clarification along these lines in the legal basis authorising accession and a provision or declaration on the limited competences of the Union to be included in the accession treaty. The result would be that the "scope" of accession would be confined to the sphere of the Union's current competences, and that any "positive obligations" could stem from the ECHR only within those limits.

- Accession would not affect Member States' national positions within the Strasbourg system. This would be guaranteed by a "step", whereby the Convention would discuss only the constitutional authorisation for accession, while leaving it to the Council, acting unanimously, to decide on the modalities of accession, on the moment in time for acceding to additional protocols and on any reservations by the Union. Reservations by Member States would continue to be unaffected by the Union's accession, as the latter would take effect only within the framework of Union law.

The Group expressed its agreement with the approach outlined by the Chairman.

2. Modalities and consequences of possible incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties

– examination of certain technical adjustments to the horizontal provisions of the Charter

The Chairman submitted to the Group his compromise proposals (see WD 23) concerning technical adjustments to the horizontal articles (Articles 51 and 52) of the Charter, on the assumption that the Charter would be incorporated as a binding text.

A large majority of speakers congratulated the Chairman on his compromise proposals. These speakers noted the great clarity and precision of the technical adjustments proposed, which would be such as to remove the legal ambiguities of the Charter hitherto criticised by some. At the same time, they pointed out that these adjustments would involve no change to the substance of the Charter. Several members pointed out that it would be much easier for them on this basis to convince their respective national governments and parliaments about incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties. Some members stressed that, from the viewpoint of the candidate countries which had not participated in the previous Convention, the proposed amendments would be of great assistance to those countries' national courts for future interpretation of the provisions of the Charter, should the latter become legally binding.

One member of the Group was opposed to the adjustments proposed by the Chairman, on the grounds that they would not respect the working method approved by the Group not to touch the text of the Charter, that they would not really add any useful legal points and that some of the clauses proposed, notably rules of interpretation, would not have their place in a constitutional text. The Chairman pointed out here that the examination of technical amendments to the horizontal provisions of the Charter had been understood from the outset as indeed being included in the Group's mandate.

Following some drafting work, based in particular on certain proposals for amendments made by one member, the members of the Group attending the meeting, with the exception of one member who upheld a reservation, agreed on a slightly amended version of the drafting adjustments to Articles 51 and 52 of the Charter as well as on some explanations of those adjustments to be included in the report. These adjustments would be recommended to the plenary in the form of an Annex to the Group's report.

The members of the Group also agreed that the explanations given in the Group's report concerning these adjustments should be added to the "Explanations" of the Praesidium of the previous Convention in order to have available "preparatory work" for the Charter as a whole.

– The question of Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty in its present version

Most of the speakers emphasised that at this stage, before having further details of the future structure of the Treaty, it was premature to give a final assessment of whether or not it was useful to retain the references to the two sources of inspiration as currently made in Article 6(2) TEU. The discussion showed that opinions, as already voiced at the Group's second meeting (see CONV 203/02 WG II 07), differed over this matter. The Group decided to refrain from making concrete recommendations on this matter, but to point this out to the plenary, which should discuss the matter together with the concrete form of incorporating the Charter.

3. Possible points for the Group's draft final report

The Chairman gave a detailed oral presentation of the points which he intended to include in his final report. The Group held a discussion during which members expressed their agreement to the inclusion of the points, provided some clarification of them and raised further points to be added to the report.

It was agreed that the Chairman would circulate his draft report to the Group by 16 October at the latest (but would do his best to do so by 15 October), and that members could forward their written reactions until 17 October. On the basis of those reactions, the Chairman would revise his draft and submit it for adoption at the meeting on 21 October.

The seventh and last meeting of the working group II (Charter/ECHR) was held on the 21st of October 2002 between 09h30 and 12h30 under the chairmanship of Commissioner Antonio Vitorino.

I. Adoption of the Group's final report

The Chairman introduced the subject by giving an overview of members' written reactions to the draft report distributed to the members of the group on the 14th of October (working document n°26).

The Chairman expressed his gratitude to the members for their support expressed by most of them as well as for their spirit of cooperation that allowed working in the perspective of a highly consensual report. The Chairman then presented a revised version of the report drawn up in order to take account of the written observations made by several members .

After thorough discussion all the members of the group agreed on the final version of the report (CONV 354/02) to be presented to the Plenary session of the European Convention in view of its next meeting on the 28-29 October 2002.

The Chairman reiterated his thanks to the members of the group, as well as to the secretariat, for their hard work and involvement in fulfilling the group's mandate.

I. OPENING OF THE SESSION*1. Presentation of the preliminary draft of the Constitutional Treaty by the Chairman

The Chairman presented the draft structure of the future Treaty drawn up by the Praesidium. He emphasised that this was a draft of a Constitutional Treaty, thus reflecting the wish of well-nigh the entire Convention. The approach adopted was based on the broad consensus which emerged during the debate at the last plenary in favour of the principle of a single legal personality, which paved the way for merger of the Treaties on the European Community and on the European Union. This single text would consist of three parts:

- Part One, containing provisions laying down the institutional architecture;
- Part Two, dealing with the Union's policies and action;
- Part Three, containing the final clauses and provisions on legal continuity usually found in this kind of constitutional act.

<sup>1</sup> The verbatim record of the plenary session may be found on the following website:
<http://european-convention.eu.int>

- (a) Part One, consisting of the fundamental provisions and which would therefore need to be particularly clear and sharply defined, would open with a preamble and then set down:
- what the Union is (its definition and legal nature);
  - why the Member States decided to come together (the values and goals bringing them together);
  - what it means to be a citizen of the Union and the fundamental rights of the Union;
  - the competences of the Union, specifying that the Union has only such competences as are conferred upon it. The principles of subsidiarity and proportionality would be set forth in detailed manner;
  - the institutions of the Union;
  - how the implementation of Union action is organised in an endeavour to achieve simplicity, transparency and efficiency;
  - the principles of the democratic life of the Union,
  - Union finances;
  - Union action in the world;
  - relations between the Union and its immediate environment;
  - the concept that the Union is open to all European States which respect its values and fundamental rights and accept its rules.
- (b) Part Two of the Treaty, on the Union's policies and action, would contain a large number of clauses from the existing treaties. Technical amendments would be made to the articles relating to Union policies – a necessary operation to ensure that Part Two was in line with Part One.
- (c) Part Three would consist of the final provisions and those on legal continuity. In the light of the overall draft – which meets the desire for a simplification of treaty structure – it would be logical and virtually inevitable to see the new Constitutional Treaty as supplanting the existing Treaties. Working on that assumption, the final provisions should include clauses guaranteeing legal continuity in relation to the Community and the European Union.

The second section of the document containing the draft Treaty (Convention 369/02) aims to outline the content of the provisions of the basic part of the Treaty. The outline sets out to illustrate the articulation of the draft Constitutional Treaty and to show where the various sections would appear in the text.

The Chairman remarked that some of these indications reflected tendencies beginning to emerge from the Convention's work; others embodied proposals which had been put forward on various sides but had yet to be discussed or developed. The matter of whether certain articles would be retained and their exact content would be addressed in future proceedings of the Convention.

The Chairman said that, in the first few months of 2003 and depending on the results of the plenary discussions on the recommendations in the Working Group reports, the Praesidium intended to present sections of the draft Treaty produced on the basis of elements put forward. That is how the building blocks would take their place in the constitutional structure and the Convention could attain its goal.

2. The role of national parliaments

- debate on the report of Working Group IV on the role of national parliaments, chaired by Ms Stuart (CONV 353/02)

The Chair of the Working Group, Ms Gisela Stuart, presented the conclusions reached by the Group, as set out in its final report (CONV 323/02). The Group had considered the role of national parliaments with respect to three main issues: oversight of the action of their governments in the Council, monitoring of the application of the principle of subsidiarity, and the role and function of multilateral interparliamentary networks or mechanisms.

The Chair recalled that the Group had concluded that the duty of national parliaments was first and foremost to hold their governments to account when they take decisions at a European level. It was generally agreed in the Group that an exchange of best practice on scrutiny models would be useful to improve national systems. The Group further considered that openness of the Council when it legislates was crucial to allowing effective scrutiny by national parliaments. The Group had made a number of recommendations for enabling measures, including the strengthening of provisions in the protocol on the role of national parliaments annexed to the Amsterdam Treaty. On Subsidiarity the Group in general terms endorsed the conclusions of the Working Group chaired by Mr Mendez de Vigo. Finally, the Group made several recommendations regarding the structuring of relations between national parliaments and the European Parliament. The Chair underlined that the overall aim of the recommendations of the Group was to enhance the involvement of national parliaments in the EU, to encourage a sense of ownership, and to give them a real voice in a constructive way, without delaying the legislative process at the European level. The Chair stressed that while the Group had reached consensus on many issues, its members were of the view that a Plenary debate on institutional questions would be necessary before they could take firm positions on proposals for a new forum bringing together national parliaments and the European Parliament to debate, for example, the larger political orientations and strategy of the EU.

The general debate following the presentation revealed broad support among members of the Convention for the Working Group's report and recommendations. The following can be noted from the debate with regard to particular elements of the report:

There was widespread recognition of the importance of greater involvement of national parliaments in the activities of the Union: several members argued for specific recognition of their role in the future Constitutional Treaty. The role of national parliaments in bringing the Union closer to its citizens was underlined.

The recommended measures to facilitate improved national parliamentary scrutiny, while leaving the organisation of actual national scrutiny to each Member State in line with their Constitutional requirements and parameters arrangements, received broad support: permitting rapid access to both consultative documents and legislative proposals through their direct transmission to national parliaments were seen as an important step. The fact that the recommendations in the report were concrete and could rapidly be made operational was highlighted. A large number of speakers underlined the fact that full openness of the Council when exercising its legislative functions was essential to efficient parliamentary scrutiny of the action of governments in the Council, and expressed their support for the recommendations of the Working Group in this respect.

The Group's endorsement of the conclusions of the Working Group on Subsidiarity was welcomed by a large number of members, many of whom underlined the importance of involving national parliaments at an early stage of the legislative procedure. Several members welcomed the suggestions in the Working Group report to further enhance the subsidiarity mechanism. They referred in particular to the link between subsidiarity and proportionality and to the proposal not to restrict the right of appeal to those national parliaments which had issued a reasoned opinion at the early stage. Some members repeated their view that regions with legislative powers should have a right of appeal in areas within their scope of competence. One member recalled his doubts about an early-warning mechanism.

The importance of networking and exchange of good practice between national parliaments was underlined by several members, who saw this as a further means of increasing awareness in national parliaments of European Union activities and to enhance their capacity for efficient scrutiny. They considered that COSAC, possibly reformed and strengthened, could play an important role in this respect. Some advocated the creation of a small COSAC secretariat.

The recommendation of the Working Group to formalise, in the Treaty, the Convention method as a prior mechanism to consider future treaty changes met with a favourable response. Some suggested that Conventions need not necessarily be restricted to the preparation of future treaty changes and Intergovernmental Conferences, but could potentially have a wider remit.

Much of the debate was devoted to a discussion of ideas for involving national parliaments in EU debate on major strategic and policy issues. Ideas in this field included - in addition to the model of the Convention - the organisation of European weeks each year, as a common window for European debate in each Member State, the organisation of interparliamentary conferences on specific issues, and the creation of a Congress.

A considerable number of speakers were reluctant to envisage the creation of new institutions or bodies, because this could further complicate the institutional architecture, and in this context questioned the role of a Congress that would periodically bring together national and European parliamentarians. Several speakers thought that the Convention should defer consideration of the issue to the broader institutional debate that would take place at a later stage. Some thought it important to have a clear and precise idea of the objectives and the functions of any new mechanism or body: some thought that the possibility of convening a Convention, together with other existing means of networking between national and European parliamentarians, would be sufficient.

A number of speakers nevertheless supported the idea of a Congress, provided that it would not have any legislative powers. Some suggestions for its possible functions were advanced. It was argued that such a forum might provide increased democratic control of the European Council and it should be seen as complementary to the European Parliament. Those expressing an interest in the idea of a Congress were divided on whether it should have a role in appointments.

The President, closing the debate, drew the following conclusions:

- A large consensus could be noted regarding the importance of a stronger involvement of national parliaments in the activities of the Union, and the recognition of their role in the context of the future Constitutional Treaty.
- Their involvement should primarily lie in efficient control of the action of national governments: the Working Group's proposals for the direct transmission of texts and other practical measures were therefore welcome, and supported by the Plenary.
- Support for the recommendations of the Working Group on Subsidiarity, and the creation of an early-warning mechanism, was reconfirmed.
- The need to strengthen the possibilities for consultation and exchange of best practice between national parliaments was recognised.
- Several ideas had been advanced on how better to involve national parliaments in debates on the large orientations of the European Union, including the formalisation of the method of the Convention in the Constitutional Treaty, the organisation of European weeks, interparliamentary conferences on specific issues, and the creation of a Congress in which national and European parliamentarians would periodically meet. The Convention would need to explore the potential role and functions of a Congress further: in the view of the Chairman, such a Congress could play an important role in involving senior national parliamentarians, together with the European Parliament, in bringing debates on major issues (e.g. Enlargements) to the attention of wider public opinion. The Convention would revert to these issues.

3. Progress report by Mr Hänsch on the proceedings of Group VI on economic governance
4. Progress report by Mr Christopherson on the proceedings of Group V on complementary competence

The Convention heard oral presentations on the proceedings of each of these two Groups, which will present their reports at the next meeting (7-8 November).

5. The Charter of Fundamental Rights

- debate on the report by Group II chaired by Mr Vitorino (CONV 354/02)

The Working Group chaired by Commissioner Antonio Vitorino had been asked to examine:

- Modalities and consequences of possible incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties
- Modalities and consequences of possible accession of the EC/EU to the European Convention on Human Rights ("ECHR")
- In addition, the Group has also examined the question of effective judicial remedies and access of individuals to the European Court of Justice.

In introducing the debate, the President congratulated all members of the Group and its Chairman on having succeeded in producing a highly consensual report. The main features of the report as presented by Mr Antonio Vitorino were as follows:

The Group underlined that the political decision concerning the incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties was for the Convention. All members of the Group however either strongly supported incorporation in a form which would make the Charter legally binding and give it constitutional status or did not rule out giving favourable consideration to such incorporation.

As to the modalities of possible incorporation the basic options were: either insertion of the text of the Charter articles at the beginning of the Constitutional Treaty, in a Title or Chapter of that Treaty; or insertion of an appropriate reference to the Charter in one article of the Constitutional Treaty; such a reference could be combined with annexing or attaching the Charter to the Constitutional Treaty, either as a specific part of the Constitutional Treaty containing only the Charter or as a separate legal text (e.g., in form of a Protocol). According to one member of the Group, an "indirect reference" to the Charter could be used in order to make the Charter legally binding without giving it constitutional status.

In the Group's view the content of the Charter in its substance was a consensus crafted by the previous Convention: the Group did not recommend any substantive modifications. In order to render it absolutely clear and watertight, they had however drafted and submitted proposed adjustments of certain horizontal clauses included in the Charter. They had also discussed other questions such as: the preamble of the Charter, the role of the Praesidium Explanations, and the question of Article 6(2).

Concerning the modalities and consequences of possible accession of the EC/EU to the ECHR, all members of the Group either strongly supported or were ready to give favourable consideration to the creation of a constitutional authorisation enabling the Union to accede to the ECHR. Within this question the Group insisted on two points: preservation of the autonomy of Union law and the Luxembourg Court, and the introduction of technical safeguards in order to make clear that accession would not modify the division of competences between the Union and the Member States.

The Group also discussed the Union's current system of remedies available to individuals, notably in the light of the fundamental right to effective judicial protection. In this context, the Group drew the Convention's attention notably to the question whether or not the conditions of direct access by individuals to the Court (Article 230, fourth paragraph, TEC) need to be reformed in the interest of ensuring effective judicial protection. The Group refrained from making concrete recommendations: instead they commended the question of possible reform of Article 230, fourth paragraph, TEC for further examination by the Convention in an appropriate context.

In the general debate, speakers across the board welcomed the conclusions of the Working Group and congratulated it and its Chairman for having succeeded in producing such a highly consensual report on a complex matter which had in the past given rise to concerns and disagreement.

A very large majority of speakers supported incorporation of the Charter into the Constitutional Treaty thereby making the Charter a legally binding text with constitutional status, or stated that - on the basis of the common understanding reached and of the conditions defined by the Group - they were now ready to consider such an incorporation favourably, leaving behind the disagreements of the past. It was stated that fundamental rights are a key building block which would, through incorporation of the Charter, find their rightful place in the Union's future Constitution, and that such incorporation would follow the logic of the evolution from an economic Community to a political Union of common values.

One member welcomed the useful and solid technical work done by the Working Group which teased out many of the difficult issues raised by the Charter, and stated that the political decision on incorporation should be taken by the Plenary in due course. Another member referred to continuing concern about the Charter and particularly about its provisions touching on employment and social matters.

As to the concrete form of incorporation of the Charter, a series of speakers favoured the option of insertion of the text of the Charter articles in the Constitutional Treaty (option "a" in the Group's report). According to these speakers, this would enhance the visibility of fundamental rights in the Constitutional Treaty and express their high symbolic value clearly to the citizens.

Several other Convention members expressed a preference for the second basic option set out in the Group's report, i.e. incorporating the Charter through an appropriate reference made to it in an article of the Constitutional Treaty and, as some added, annexing or attaching it to the Treaty as a separate legal document. These speakers argued that this technique would best serve the interest of a short and legible Treaty, better preserve the integrity of the Charter, and avoid certain technical complications arising in the case of direct insertion of the Charter text into the Treaty.

A much smaller number of speakers preferred to make an "indirect" reference in an article of the Treaty to the Charter as a source for interpreting fundamental rights as general principles of Union law, arguing that not all articles of the Charter could in the same way entail justiciable rights for the citizens, or that some Charter rights would need more precise formulation.

Most speakers stated their support for the drafting adjustments in the horizontal provisions of the Charter as proposed by the Group, and were satisfied that these adjustments did not constitute changes of substance to the Charter. A number of speakers welcomed the adjustments as enhancing legal certainty and clarity and allowing different legal traditions to find themselves in the Charter, thereby paving the way for the Charter to become a legally binding text. Other speakers expressed the view that the amended horizontal clauses as proposed by the Group were not necessary and simply stated the obvious, but would not do any harm and could therefore be accepted if they helped to bring about consensus on incorporation of the Charter as a legally binding text.

Certain members, however, expressed reservations about the amendments to the horizontal articles proposed by the Group, seeing them as unnecessary or potentially diluting the standard of protection foreseen by the Charter and contrary to the basic line of respecting the content of the Charter. In particular, it was argued that proposed Article 52 (5) on the effect of "principles" of the Charter could be understood as contradicting the obligation, enshrined in Article 51 (1), to observe these principles and to promote their application, and that it unduly restricted the legal force of these principles which, according to these members, should be justiciable generally and not merely as regards acts specifically taken in implementation of the principles. One member saw ambiguities in the formula "with due regard to the principle of subsidiarity" in Article 51 (1) of the Charter, expressed doubts about the enforceability of certain Charter provisions, and stressed the need to know which Charter articles were, respectively, rights or principles.

A number of speakers stressed the need to preserve the preamble of the Charter which contained important statements on the fundamental nature of the Union and represented a delicate political consensus reached by the previous Convention. These members therefore called for that preamble to be incorporated into, or used as, the preamble of the Constitutional Treaty.

Several speakers underlined the importance of the Explanations which had been prepared at the instigation of the Praesidium of the previous Convention. Although, as stressed by some speakers, these Explanations have no legal value, they were seen as an extremely useful aid to interpretation - inter alia for the courts and authorities of the candidate countries which had not participated in the drafting of the Charter - or as a vital part of the overall political package on the Charter. In this perspective, speakers welcomed the Group's recommendation to incorporate the explanations given by the Working Group on the technical amendments on the Charter with the original Explanations. It was, however, recalled by one member that the Explanations were drawn up under the sole responsibility of the Praesidium and did not engage the previous Convention which had decided not to discuss them.

A vast majority of speakers supported the insertion in the Constitutional Treaty of a constitutional authorisation enabling the Union to accede to the ECHR. Several speakers welcomed in this context the common understanding reached by the Group on key issues raised by accession to the ECHR; it was notably stressed that the autonomy of Union law and the position of the Court of Justice will not be undermined by accession; that, through the use of certain safeguards, it will be clear that the legal "scope" of accession will be limited to the Union's competencies without leading to any extension of these competencies; and that the national positions expressed with respect to the ECHR and its protocols will remain unaffected. A further point frequently made was that incorporation of the Charter and accession by the Union to the ECHR should be considered not as alternatives but as complementary initiatives, leading together to a situation analogous of that in national legal systems.

In this context, a number of speakers stressed the primary importance which they attribute to accession by the Union to the ECHR and recalled the main arguments for accession as developed in the Group's report. Some qualified accession by the Union to the ECHR as a necessity if the Charter became legally binding, in order to ensure that the relationship between the two European Courts was properly resolved; a call was also made for a political declaration in favour of accession to accompany the Constitutional Treaty.

Other members took the view that the Convention should limit itself to creating a legal base authorising the Union to accede to the ECHR and leave the decision on opening accession negotiations, and the modalities, to the Union institutions (on the basis of unanimity in the Council); one of these members specified that, prior to such a decision, it should be examined whether such an accession would be possible without encroaching on the autonomy of Union law, affecting the individual positions of Member States with respect to the ECHR or extending the Union's competence.

A small number of members expressed reservations about the idea of accession by the Union to the ECHR, calling for further reflection on whether such a step would not lead to an undue prolongation of judicial procedures or risk extending the Union's competencies or undermining the Court of Justice.

Several speakers underlined the importance of effective judicial remedies and called for an extension of the rights of action of individuals before the European Court of Justice, or requested further consideration on this issue. It was argued that lacunae of protection exist currently, given the strict conditions set out in Article 230, fourth paragraph, TEC, the fact that this Article mentions actions against institutions only, but not against bodies of the Union, and the current limitations on jurisdiction in Justice and Home Affairs. One member called for a stronger European Ombudsman with a view to reinforcing the protection of citizens' complaints.

In a final statement replying to points made during the discussion, the Chairman of the Working Group stressed that the Working Group's consensual report represented a compromise. He explained that the proposed text of Article 52 (4) would enshrine in the Charter the approach already followed by the Court of Justice, according to which the common constitutional traditions did not oblige the Court to stick to a common minimum denominator but instead to designate the common values of the Member States, which may not necessarily be stated with the same scope and meaning in all constitutions. He furthermore stressed that the Charter already makes a clear and undeniable distinction between subjective rights and principles that do not grant self-executing rights to concrete benefits but call for acts of implementation, a distinction which would only be spelt out in clearer terms in the new clause. As to the "Explanations" on the Charter, he confirmed that the Group's explanations would need to be added to the original Explanations in the further course of the Convention's work; he would be ready to take on this work of editing a consolidated version in close consultation with the members of the Working Group, and to submit it to the Praesidium. Finally, the Chairman of the Working Group argued that accession to the ECHR would not lead to significant extra delays in judicial proceedings, given that citizens can already today, in national proceedings relating to Union law, invoke the ECHR and go to the Strasbourg Court; accession would, however, permit, in such cases, the Union, as the author of the alleged human rights violation, itself to defend its acts rather than force Member States to assume the defence. He also argued that it would be strange if the Union, which required adherence to the ECHR from candidate countries as a condition of membership, were not ready to take the same step itself.

The President again congratulated Mr Vitorino, and expressed full endorsement of his summary of, and reactions to, the debate.

6. Preliminary debate on the preliminary draft Constitutional Treaty

Members of the Convention gave their preliminary views on the preliminary draft Treaty submitted by the Chairman on behalf of the Praesidium.

The architecture of the future Treaty was favourably received; the structure of the Treaty was deemed good while its essential features, namely its constitutional nature, the fact that it was a single Treaty, the explicit conferral of a single legal personality and the clarity and readability of the "backbone" of the draft were commended by the members as a bold approach which met the expectations of both the Convention and Union citizens.

More specific comments were also made:

- several members stressed the importance of the substantive elements, particularly concerning institutional matters, which would enhance the structure; some already saw in the draft architecture a balanced compromise; others made their backing for the structure subject to agreement on the solution finally adopted for institutional matters;
- some members stressed with satisfaction that the preliminary draft would be able finally to give citizens a sense of being part of a political union and not just of a single market;
- some members suggested that Article 1 should refer to peoples and not just to States; it was also suggested that an addition be made to the effect that the Union's citizens were united by the same values;
- a number of members expressed doubts about the second indent of Article 14, (as they feared that joint activity by Member States was a step backwards in the case of certain common policies);
- a number of members pointed out that the new policies reflected the Union's real priorities but differed in nature from "Community" policies and should therefore be covered by specific procedures;
- the importance of the Treaty emphasising the multicultural nature of the Union was stressed by several members, while some mentioned the need to refer to gender equality;
- the debate on finding a new name for the new Europe was regarded as pointless by a number of members, as the term European Union had already become part and parcel of the language of citizens;

- some members wanted a reference to national parliaments in the basic part of the Treaty;
- questions were raised about citizenship, competences, the existence in the draft of a "defence" title and of other articles concerning the Congress and the Presidency of the Council, the final clauses and the procedures for revising the Treaty.

Replying to the comments and questions, the Chairman:

- stressed the considerable progress represented by the single Treaty with the disappearance of the pillars, although this did not automatically mean that procedures and modalities would be made uniform, since specific procedures could be necessary depending on the nature of certain policies;
- confirmed that decision-making procedures and in particular the legislative procedure would be included in the basic part of the Treaty;
- stressed that national parliaments could not be cited as European institutions, but would, however, be referred to in the context of those procedures in which they were involved (subsidiarity);
- pointed out that competences were already defined in the existing Treaties but would be covered more systematically in the new Treaty;
- noted that common defence was already envisaged in the existing provisions of the TEU (Article 17);
- reiterated that the existence of certain articles and their content would depend on the Convention's debates; they were, however, referred to in order to show where they might fit into into the structure.

The Chairman concluded that from the beginning of 2003 the Praesidium could, on the basis of the substantive points which emerged from the debate on the Working Groups' conclusions, start drawing up more detailed proposals. The institutional questions, which needed to be seen from an overall viewpoint, would not be entrusted to Working Groups but would be debated in plenary.

II. NEXT SESSION OF THE CONVENTION

The Chairman announced that the Convention's next meeting would take place starting at 15.00 on Thursday 7 and 9.30 on Friday 8 November. It would be devoted to examination of the reports by the Working Groups on economic governance and complementary competence and a debate on Social Europe.

FR

Le Président. – Voilà, mes chers Collègues, la Convention européenne avance. Aujourd'hui, elle va franchir une étape significative.

28 février - 28 octobre. 8 mois exactement après l'ouverture de la Convention, je vous présente, aujourd'hui, l'architecture de la future Constitution européenne. Dès le départ, nous savions que nous devrions aboutir à un texte unique, un projet de Traité Constitutionnel. D'ailleurs, vous avez bien voulu m'applaudir quand je l'ai proposé dans mon discours d'ouverture de la Convention.

Les discussions que nous avons eues jusqu'ici ont paru à certains parfois trop générales, parfois trop techniques. Elles étaient pourtant indispensables avant de pouvoir définir les contours d'un premier projet. Un document a été remis personnellement à chacune et à chacun d'entre vous. Je souhaitais, en effet, que ce soit une remise personnelle et non pas la simple distribution d'un document.

Sur la base des discussions que nous avons tenues jusqu'ici, nous avons élaboré, avec le Praesidium, le projet d'architecture du futur Traité constitutionnel. Ainsi, j'honore devant vous l'engagement pris avant l'été. Au mois de juin et de juillet, certains d'entre vous étaient impatients de voir apparaître ce projet d'architecture pour pouvoir mettre davantage d'ordre dans nos débats et dans nos réflexions. Vous constaterez que ce projet est celui d'un Traité constitutionnel car il nous est apparu que cela reflète la volonté de la quasi-totalité de la Convention.

Un Traité Constitutionnel s'impose pour marquer l'étape de la fondation d'une Europe rénovée, acceptant nos frères des pays candidats, une Europe dans laquelle tous les citoyens doivent se reconnaître comme Européens et à laquelle toutes les institutions nationales, régionales et locales doivent pouvoir participer, chacune à son niveau de responsabilité.

Le point de départ de ce texte est le large consensus dégagé lors de notre débat de la dernière session en faveur du principe d'une personnalité juridique unique. En effet, ceci ouvre la voie, jusqu'ici fermée, à la fusion des Traités de la Communauté et de l'Union européenne. Cette fusion constitue un pas fondamental en direction de la simplification et répond ainsi à l'attente, et même à l'impatience, de l'opinion publique.

Ce texte unique comporterait trois parties. La première partie contiendrait les dispositions définissant l'architecture constitutionnelle et institutionnelle. La deuxième partie porterait sur les politiques et les actions de l'Union. La troisième partie contiendrait les clauses finales et les clauses de continuité juridique habituelles dans ce type d'acte constitutionnel. L'ensemble, enfin, serait complété par un petit nombre de protocoles.

La première partie, celle qui reprend les dispositions fondamentales, doit être particulièrement claire et percutante. Il faut savoir qu'un texte constitutionnel est un texte qui doit avoir une certaine force, par lui-même et à la limite, un certain lyrisme, afin de définir de manière accessible à tous, jeunes étudiants, jeunes lycéens, travailleurs de tous âges et de tous milieux, les bases et les fonctionnements de l'Union. La première qualité de notre Traité constitutionnel doit être celle d'être lisible par tous.

Cette partie comporterait un préambule et définirait ensuite un certain nombre de points. J'y reviendrai tout à l'heure. Je vous donne la liste des chapitres essentiels : ce qu'est l'Union, sa définition et sa nature juridique, pourquoi les Etats Membres ont décidé de se réunir, autrement dit les objectifs de l'Union, quelles sont les valeurs et les objectifs qui les rassemblent, ce que signifie être un citoyen de l'Union, et quels sont les droits fondamentaux des citoyens de l'Union. On y traiterait également des compétences de l'Union en spécifiant que l'Union n'a que les compétences qui lui sont attribuées, les principes de subsidiarité et de proportionnalité étant affirmés de manière précise. Figureraient aussi dans cette partie la question des institutions de l'Union, la façon dont est mise en oeuvre l'action de l'Union, comment elle est organisée dans un souci de simplicité, de transparence et d'efficacité, la nature des principes de la vie démocratique de l'Union, le problème des finances de l'Union (monnaie et budget), l'action extérieure de l'Union, les relations entre l'Union et son environnement proche et enfin, un article de principe indiquant que l'Union est ouverte à tous les Etats européens, qui respectent ses valeurs et ses droits fondamentaux et qui acceptent ses règles.

La deuxième partie du Traité sur les politiques et les actions de l'Union reprendrait, de façon naturelle, un nombre important de clauses des Traités actuels. Nous ne voulons pas, en effet, modifier les articles pour la satisfaction de donner une écriture nouvelle à ces articles. Donc, nous ne proposerons de changements qu'aux articles relatifs aux politiques de l'Union, qui découleront de notre travail sur la première partie, c'est-à-dire sur la simplification des procédures et sur la mise en oeuvre des actions de l'Union.

Enfin, la troisième partie comporterait des dispositions finales et de continuité juridique puisque nous partons de deux Traités de nature et d'objectifs différents, le Traité de Rome et le Traité de Maastricht, et que nous voulons aboutir à un texte unique.

Je vais vous donner une indication quant au contenu du travail à effectuer. Les articles actuels, sur lesquels nous travaillons, sont au nombre de 414. Une lecture rapide, ce n'est pas une précision définitive, montrerait que, la moite environ, à savoir 205 articles resteraient inchangés. 136 articles seraient légèrement modifiés, c'est-à-dire adaptés aux dispositifs nouveaux et 73 devraient être substantiellement réécrits ou regroupés. A la lumière de l'ensemble du projet, qui répond à une demande d'une simplification de l'architecture des Traités, qui figure d'ailleurs dans les textes d'origine de Nice et de Laeken, cette voie semble logique et pratiquement inévitable. Nous avons étudié les différentes hypothèses possibles, sauf à entrer dans de véritables contorsions rédactionnelles, qui nous permettent de penser que le nouveau Traité constitutionnel se substituera au Traité existant. Dans cette hypothèse, les dispositions finales devront comprendre des clauses assurant la continuité juridique par rapport aux Communautés et par rapport à l'Union européenne.

Le document qui vous a été remis comporte une seconde partie destinée à vous apporter certaines indications contenant les dispositions de la partie fondamentale du Traité. Nous avons pensé que si l'on vous donnait simplement la table des matières sans donner quelques indications, vous risqueriez de trouver cette approche un peu limitée. Et donc, ces indications de la deuxième partie que je vais vous commenter rapidement se proposent d'illustrer l'articulation de ce projet de Traité constitutionnel et d'indiquer la place que chacun des différents éléments viendra prendre dans le texte. Ainsi, certaines de ces indications correspondent à des orientations qui émergent déjà de nos travaux, notamment des conclusions du premier groupe de travail tandis que d'autres reflètent des propositions qui ont été avancées par les uns et par les autres, notamment dans vos très nombreuses contributions, mais qui doivent encore faire l'objet d'un débat ou d'un approfondissement.

Je voudrais que nous soyons très clairs vis-à-vis de vous-même bien entendu, mais aussi de la presse et des media. Il s'agit, aujourd'hui, d'une architecture, en d'autres termes, de la place des articles et des sujets traités dans l'ensemble du texte. La question de savoir si certains articles seront finalement retenus et quel sera précisément leur contenu, trouvera sa réponse dans les travaux futurs de la Convention.

Je vais maintenant vous commenter brièvement ce texte. Je commence à la page 8 du document que vous avez devant vous.

Première partie: architecture constitutionnelle

Il faudra sans doute un préambule. En effet, tous les textes constitutionnels de l'histoire politique comportent un préambule plus ou moins long, bien que nous ayons d'autres éléments tels que la Charte, qui contiendront des dispositions de nature voisine.

L'article 1 correspondrait à la décision de mettre en place une entité nommée à laquelle il faudra donner un nom puisque, à l'heure actuelle, deux noms qui sont en vigueur: d'une part Communauté européenne pour la partie venant du Traité de Rome, et d'autre part, Union européenne pour la partie venant du Traité de Maastricht. Il faudra de toute façon choisir. On peut également songer à d'autres appellations: soit l'appellation lancée au début de la construction européenne, à la fois par Jean Monnet et par Winston Churchill, qui était celle des Etats-Unis d'Europe soit une appellation qui décrirait l'état d'avancement de la construction européenne, et qui serait Europe Unie, appellation se traduisant simplement et fortement dans les différents langues de l'Union.

On donnerait ensuite la définition de cette Union. J'utiliserai le mot Union pour simplifier et ne pas reprendre chaque fois les différentes appellations possibles. Nous avons une définition. Cette définition donnera lieu à un débat. Toutefois, j'invite les Conventionnels à eux-mêmes rechercher un texte décrivant bien ce qu'est cette Union. Le texte que nous proposons est une Union d'Etats européens conservant leur identité nationale, coordonnant étroitement leur politique au niveau européen et gérant, sur le mode fédéral, certaines compétences communes Il s'agit donc d'une définition compréhensible et courte de la nature de cette Union.

Ensuite, il y aurait la reconnaissance du caractère pluriel de l'Union, c'est-à-dire les éléments de diversité qui font partie de l'Union et enfin, la mention d'une Union ouverte à tous les Etats européens qui partagent les mêmes valeurs et qui s'engagent à les promouvoir en commun.

L'article 2 énumérerait les valeurs de l'Union. Vous objecterez qu'il y a déjà la Charte des droits fondamentaux dont nous parlerons tout à l'heure et vous vous demanderez s'il n'y a pas là une redite. Pas exactement parce que la Charte est une Charte de droits. Les valeurs ne se limitent pas à l'exercice de certains droits. Il y a la dignité humaine, la démocratie, l'Etat de droit, la tolérance et enfin, le respect des obligations et du droit international. Par conséquent, il faudra préciser ce qui va dans la Charte, qui est déjà écrite et ce qui doit figurer parmi les valeurs de l'Union.

L'article 3 énoncerait les objectifs de l'Union. C'est d'ailleurs un sujet qui a été un sujet de réflexion. Vous savez que la caractéristique de notre texte par rapport à une Constitution nationale est son existence en fonction des objectifs de l'Union. Une Constitution nationale existe en fonction de l'existence de l'Etat et décrit comment l'Etat doit fonctionner. Dans la construction européenne, ce sont les objectifs qui déterminent la construction. Nous indiquons ces objectifs : sauvegarde des valeurs communes, intérêts et indépendance de l'Union, promotion de la cohésion économique et sociale, renforcement du Marché intérieur ainsi que de l'Union économique et monétaire, promotion d'un haut niveau d'emploi et d'un niveau élevé de protection sociale, niveau élevé de protection de l'environnement, encouragement au progrès technologique et scientifique, création d'un espace de liberté, de sécurité et de justice et, enfin, développement d'une politique étrangère et de sécurité commune et d'une politique de défense visant à défendre et promouvoir les valeurs de l'Union dans le monde extérieur.

Il serait précisé ensuite que ces objectifs sont poursuivis selon des modalités adaptées au fait que les compétences sont attribuées en toute ou en partie à l'Union, ou ils sont au contraire exercés conjointement par les Etats membres. Ce dernier passage se terminerait par l'article 4 qui est la reconnaissance explicite de la personnalité juridique à de nouvelles entités internationales.

Pour le titre 2, on a repris des éléments qui figurent dans les Traités. On y a ajouté des éléments qui viennent de vos propres travaux (citoyenneté de l'Union et les droits fondamentaux).

Dans l'article 5, on instituerait et définirait la citoyenneté de l'Union. Tout national d'un Etat-membre et citoyen de l'Union disposerait d'une double citoyenneté de niveau égal: la citoyenneté nationale et la citoyenneté européenne. Nous n'avons pas mis nationalité mais bien citoyenneté. C'est d'ailleurs là une proposition que l'Espagne avait faite voici quelques années. Et il utilise librement l'une ou l'autre à sa convenance, avec les droits et les devoirs attachés à chacune d'elle. Précisément, l'article énumère les droits attachés à la citoyenneté européenne – la libre circulation, le séjour, le vote et l'éligibilité aux élections municipales et au Parlement européen, la protection diplomatique de l'ensemble de l'Union dans les pays tiers, le droit de pétition, le droit d'écrire et d'obtenir une réponse des institutions européennes dans sa propre langue. Enfin, cet article établit le principe de non-discrimination entre les citoyens de l'Union en fonction de la nationalité.

Viendrait ensuite l'article concernant la Charte des droits fondamentaux. M. Vitorino exposera diverses possibilités pour la rédaction de cet article. Il pourra s'inspirer de l'article 6 du Traité sur l'Union européenne, où il y a déjà une référence à ce sujet, et M. Vitorino vous donnera les trois solutions possibles.

Le titre 3 prévoirait les compétences et les actions de l'Union. Cet article énoncerait d'abord les principes de l'action de l'Union. Ceci a été demandé par de nombreux conventionnels. Celle-ci s'exerce conformément aux dispositions du traité, dans la limite des compétences conférées par le traité et dans le respect des principes de subsidiarité et de proportionnalité solennellement annoncés dans le texte.

L'article 8 est en fait un complément. Il établirait le respect du principe selon lequel toute compétence non attribuée par la constitution à l'Union demeure de la compétence des Etats membres. C'est la conclusion d'un débat qui a eu lieu ici sur la nécessité d'avoir deux listes ou une seule. C'est donc une seule liste, avec cet article prévoyant la non-compétence lorsque les compétences ne sont pas attribuées à l'Union. Il établirait la primauté du droit de l'Union dans l'exercice des compétences qui lui ont été attribuées. Il fixerait les règles du contrôle effectif de la subsidiarité et de la proportionnalité et le rôle des parlements nationaux à cet effet serait mentionné. Enfin, il déterminerait les règles qui établissent l'adaptabilité du système. Nous en avons parlé, sans entrer dans une réflexion approfondie, c'est-à-dire le sort de l'ancien article 308 et des articles antérieurs du Traité de Rome. Enfin, il établit l'obligation de coopération loyale des Etats membres vis-à-vis de l'Union ainsi que le principe de mise en oeuvre par ceux-ci des actes des institutions.

Les articles suivants – on ne donne que le titre des articles; ils sont évidemment beaucoup plus détaillés –: l'article 9 concernerait les catégories de compétences de l'Union, qui seraient simplifiées après les travaux du groupe de travail; l'article 10 indiquerait les domaines de compétences exclusives de l'Union et reprendrait d'ailleurs dans ce domaine les textes des traités sur les Communautés, qui, semble-t-il, n'ont pas besoin d'être modifiés; l'article 11 indiquerait les domaines de compétences partagées entre l'Union et les Etats membres, et il établirait le principe selon lequel, au fur et à mesure que l'Union agit dans ces domaines, les Etats membres ne peuvent agir que dans les limites définies par la législation de l'Union. Enfin, l'article 12 indiquerait les domaines où l'Union appuie ou coordonne l'action des Etats membres mais n'a pas la compétence pour légiférer. Et enfin l'article 13 répondrait à la question suivante: dans quels domaines les Etats membres définissent-ils et mettent-ils en oeuvre, dans le cadre de l'Union, une politique commune selon des modalités spécifiques? Cet article indiquerait de quels domaines il s'agirait.

Le titre 4 fera l'objet de beaucoup d'attention et de débats à venir dans notre Convention: ce sont les institutions de l'Union.

L'article 14 indiquerait que l'Union dispose d'un cadre institutionnel unique; nous sortirions donc de l'ancien concept des piliers. Il disposerait que ce cadre assure la cohérence et la continuité des politiques et des actions menées en vue d'atteindre les objectifs de l'Union, tant s'agissant des actions dans les domaines de compétences attribuées à l'Union que s'agissant des domaines où les compétences appartiennent aux Etats membres et sont exercées par eux de façon conjointe. Cet article énumérerait les institutions de l'Union et il établirait le principe selon lequel chaque institution agit dans les limites des attributions qui lui sont conférées par les traités, conformément aux procédures prévues par ceux-ci. Il énoncerait une obligation pour les institutions européennes d'assurer et de promouvoir une administration ouverte, efficace et sobre. Il établirait le principe de coopération loyale dans les relations entre les institutions.

Ensuite, vous auriez les articles consacrés à chacune des institutions. Nous avons repris l'ordre du Traité de Rome, c'est-à-dire avec simplement l'article 15 qui, lui, est issu du Traité de Maastricht, qui définit le Conseil européen, sa composition et ses missions. Il y aurait ensuite un article 15 bis, après que la Convention en aura débattu, article qui pourrait établir la durée du mandat et le mode de désignation de la présidence du Conseil européen, son rôle et ses responsabilités.

L'article 16 établit la composition du Parlement européen dont les membres sont élus au suffrage universel direct. Il prévoira d'une manière ou d'une autre la création de moyens d'aboutir à un mode d'élection homogène sur l'ensemble du territoire de l'Union et il énumérera les attributions du Parlement européen; il prévoira la possibilité pour celui-ci d'introduire une motion de censure sur la gestion de la Commission et sa procédure et les conséquences d'une telle motion.

L'article suivant énumère la composition et les attributions du Conseil. Il ferait référence aux différentes formations du Conseil: le Conseil dans sa formation d'Affaires générales, le Conseil dans sa formation législative, et le Conseil dans sa formation de Conseil des ministres des affaires étrangères.

L'article 17 bis, par symétrie avec ce qui est dit pour le Conseil européen, établirait la règle pour la désignation de la présidence du Conseil, son rôle et ses responsabilités, ainsi que la durée de son mandat.

Ensuite, nous en viendrions à la Commission, dans l'article 18. Cet article contiendrait les dispositions relatives à la composition et aux attributions de la Commission, y compris le monopole d'initiative. Le texte, vraisemblablement, serait repris des articles du Traité de Rome. Selon les travaux à venir de la Convention, il reviendrait à la culture initiale, c'est-à-dire un collège restreint, soit une Commission plus nombreuse, et dans ce cas-là, il préciserait alors les règles de délibération.

L'article 18 bis, sur lequel beaucoup d'entre vous se sont déjà exprimés, établirait le rôle et le mode de désignation du président de la Commission.

L'article 19 évoquerait la possibilité d'instituer le Congrès des peuples d'Europe. Il déterminerait sa composition et la procédure pour la désignation de ses membres et définirait ses attributions. Il serait évidemment rédigé en fonction des travaux de la Convention.

L'article 20 porterait sur la composition et les attributions de la Cour de justice et du Tribunal de Première instance; l'article 21, sur la composition et les attributions de la Cour des comptes; l'article 22, sur la composition et les missions de la Banque centrale européenne. Pour ce qui est de l'article 23, on prévoirait que le Parlement européen, le Conseil et la Commission seraient assistés d'un Conseil économique et social et d'un Comité des régions.

On passerait ensuite, après avoir défini les compétences et les institutions, à la mise en oeuvre des actions de l'Union. L'article 24 énumérerait les différents instruments dont disposeraient les institutions de l'Union pour exercer leurs compétences. La demande concernant la réduction et la lisibilité de cette liste par rapport à la liste actuelle est actuellement examinée par le groupe de travail de M. Giuliano Amato. L'article 25 décrirait la procédure législative de l'Union, en termes classiques, c'est-à-dire procédure d'adoption des lois et des lois-cadres. L'article 26 décrirait clairement les procédures d'adoption des décisions et l'article 27 décrirait les procédures de mise en oeuvre par l'Union des actes qui relèvent de sa compétence ainsi que les moyens de surveillance de leur exécution, puisqu'il a souvent été souligné qu'il y avait une lacune institutionnelle à cet égard. Enfin, l'article 28 décrirait les procédures de mise en oeuvre par l'Union des actions d'appui, y compris des programmes, ainsi que les moyens de surveillance de leur exécution.

Les trois articles suivants, 29, 30 et 31, décriraient les procédures d'application dans le domaine de la politique étrangère et de sécurité commune, dans le domaine de la politique de défense commune, ainsi que les procédures d'application en matière de police et de justice dans le domaine pénal.

Je passe sur l'article 32, parce qu'il correspond à des dispositions déjà débattues dans des traités antérieurs. Il concernerait les conditions pour l'instauration d'une coopération renforcée dans le cadre du traité, et donc les domaines exclus de cette coopération, comme le principe de l'application des obligations des Etats participants.

Un titre nouveau, qui ne figure pas dans les traités, serait le titre 6: la vie démocratique de l'Union. Beaucoup d'entre vous ont exprimé le souci d'une mise en lumière de la vie démocratique de l'Union.

L'article 33 établirait le principe selon lequel les citoyens de l'Union sont égaux vis-à-vis de toutes ses institutions.

L'article 34 énonce le principe d'une démocratie participative. Nous n'intervenons pas dans l'architecture institutionnelle des Etats membres, mais nous indiquons que les institutions assurent un degré élevé de transparence permettant aux différentes formes d'associations des citoyens de participer à la vie de l'Union.

L'article 35 reprendrait l'idée que l'élément central de l'expression démocratique est le Parlement européen. Un protocole assurerait l'élection du Parlement européen selon une procédure uniforme, ou plutôt homogène, dans tous les Etats membres.

L'article 36 établit la règle de la publicité des délibérations législatives du Parlement européen et du Conseil lorsque celui-ci siège dans sa forme législative.

L'article 37 établirait les règles de vote applicables aux délibérations des institutions de l'Union, y compris la définition des majorités qualifiées, ou éventuellement super qualifiées, et la mise en oeuvre de la possibilité de l'abstention constructive et de ses conséquences.

Il y aurait un titre 7 – beaucoup d'entre vous l'ont souhaité – sur les finances de l'Union. Cet article prévoirait que le budget de l'Union soit intégralement financé par des ressources propres, et prévoirait une procédure à suivre pour l'établissement du système de ressources propres.

L'article 39 poserait le principe de l'équilibre budgétaire ainsi que les dispositions concernant la discipline budgétaire.

Enfin, l'article 40 serait un article technique sur le budget, décrivant la procédure d'adoption du budget.

Ensuite, vous avez différents titres. L'action de l'Union dans le monde: titre 9. L'article 41 devrait établir qui représente l'Union dans les relations internationales, en tenant compte des compétences déjà exercées au titre de la Communauté. En fonction des travaux de la Convention, cet article devrait définir le rôle et le rang futur du haut représentant pour la politique étrangère et de sécurité commune. Le titre 9 serait original, puisqu'il n'existe pas dans les traités. Ce serait un article-cadre pouvant contenir les dispositions définissant une relation privilégiée entre l'Union et les Etats de son voisinage s'il était décidé de créer une telle relation.

Le titre 10, qui a donné lieu à des commentaires ou à des traductions un peu déformantes, porte sur l'appartenance à l'Union. On y rappelle d'abord que l'Union est ouverte à tous les Etats d'Europe qui partagent ses valeurs, etc. L'article 44 établirait la procédure pour l'adhésion de nouveaux Etats à l'union européenne. M. Duff a d'ailleurs fait des propositions originales dans ce domaine. L'article 45 reprendrait un article qui a été introduit dans le Traité sur l'Union européenne pour la suspension des droits d'appartenance à l'Union en cas de constatation d'une violation des principes et des valeurs de l'Union de la part d'un Etat membre. L'article 46 mentionnerait ce que l'on appelle the right to secession dans le droit constitutionnel anglo-saxon, et notamment américain, c'est-à-dire la possibilité d'établir une procédure de retrait volontaire de l'Union sur décision d'un Etat membre, ainsi que les conséquences institutionnelles d'un tel retrait. Comme le traité lui-même sera vraisemblablement établi pour une durée illimitée, que ce n'est pas un traité avec une échéance, il est normal, sur la longue durée, de réserver la possibilité pour un Etat, s'il le souhaite, de se retirer de l'Union.

La deuxième partie, que je ne commenterai pas, comprendra tous les chapitres des politiques et indiquera le type de compétence et les actes et procédures qui seront applicables. Il sera nécessaire d'introduire des amendements techniques aux textes antérieurs, c'est-à-dire principalement aux textes du Traité de Rome, pour mettre en conformité cette deuxième partie.

Il y aurait enfin les dispositions générales et finales, qui seraient l'abrogation des traités antérieurs, inévitable en raison de la procédure suivie, la continuité juridique par rapport aux Communautés européennes et à l'Union européenne, et ensuite des questions techniques et juridiques, le champ d'application du traité, l'indication que les protocoles annexés au traité en font partie intégrante; un point important, la procédure de révision du traité constitutionnel; l'adoption, la ratification et l'entrée en vigueur de ce traité, et la durée: il serait conclu pour une durée illimitée; enfin, on énumérerait les langues dans lesquelles le traité serait rédigé et qui feraient foi.

Voilà donc cette architecture. Comme je n'ai pas voulu qu'elle vous parvienne par morceaux, on vous a remis tout à l'heure ce texte. Mais, naturellement, vous avez besoin d'un certain délai pour l'examiner et pour y réfléchir. Aussi, nous vous proposons de travailler de la manière suivante: le débat sur l'architecture n'est pas un débat sur le contenu des différents articles, nous essayons en fait de savoir si cette architecture est convenable, adaptée ou devrait être améliorée ou amendée. Nous pourrions, demain matin, aménager notre emploi du temps afin de consacrer environ une heure et demie à vos premières réactions. Le débat sera plus approfondi par la suite. Nous aurons en effet d'autres occasions d'en débattre en profondeur au fur et à mesure du retour des rapports des groupes de travail qui vont porter sur telle ou telle partie de cette architecture. L'idée serait que le praesidium puisse présenter, au cours des premiers mois de l'année 2003, et en fonction des résultats de nos débats, des sections du projet de traité qui auront été nourries grâce aux éléments dégagés sur la base des rapports des groupes de travail et de vos débats en séance. Il faudra aussi, à un moment ou à un autre, insérer dans cette procédure de réflexion une réflexion plus précise sur l'aspect institutionnel, mais l'aspect institutionnel viendra à partir de cette démarche, précisément, sur les compétences et leur exercice. C'est ainsi que les éléments de construction viendront prendre leur place dans la structure constitutionnelle et que nous allons, lentement mais sûrement, atteindre notre but. Ainsi, la tortue sera présente au rendez-vous de l'été 2003.

Voilà, mes chers conventionnels, ce que je voulais vous dire aujourd'hui en ouvrant cette séance et en vous remettant ce document à propos duquel vous pourrez, si vous le souhaitez, faire part demain matin d'un premier ensemble de réactions.

Nous allons maintenant poursuivre nos travaux tels qu'ils ont été organisés et donc écouter les rapports de deux de nos groupes de travail. D'abord, concernant les horaires, nous travaillerons jusque 20 h, avec une pause de 17 h 30 à 18 h. Nous aurons maintenant les conclusions du groupe de travail sur les parlements nationaux, le groupe présidé par Mme Gisela Stuart, et demain matin les conclusions du groupe de travail sur la Charte des droits fondamentaux, présentées par M. Vitorino. Ce seront les débats finaux sur ces deux questions: rôle des parlements nationaux et Charte. Par contre, nous entendrons en fin d'après-midi M. Hänsch qui nous présentera en avant-première les résultats de son groupe de travail, et M. Christophersen, sur l'état d'avancement des travaux de son groupe. Demain matin, la réunion commencera à 9 h 30 par le débat sur le rapport Vitorino, et à partir de 11 h 30 aura lieu le débat préliminaire sur l'architecture du projet de traité constitutionnel. Voilà donc deux journées très chargées qui vous imposent un grand effort d'attention et de réflexion. <BRK>

Le Président. – Mes chers Collègues, nous allons commencer nos travaux. Vous savez que nous allons écouter le rapport du groupe de travail numéro 2, présidé par Monsieur António Vitorino, sur la Charte des droits fondamentaux.

Vous avez tous reçu le rapport de ce groupe de travail concernant l'intégration de la Charte des droits fondamentaux ainsi que sur l'adhésion de l'Union à la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme.

Avant de donner la parole à Monsieur Vitorino, je voudrais le féliciter, ainsi que tous les membres de son groupe de travail, pour avoir réussi à produire un rapport très consensuel. En effet, c'était là un sujet qui méritait, peut-être plus encore que d'autres, de bénéficier d'un large consensus parmi les Européens, mais qui a soulevé au départ, un certain nombre de questions difficiles et controversées, notamment de nature juridique.

Comme le dit le rapport, ce n'était pas au groupe de travail d'anticiper sur les décisions à caractère politique, qui reviendront à la Convention elle-même et aux Institutions européennes. Vous avez, grâce à un travail très vigoureux et très minutieux, dégagé une position commune sur toutes les questions essentielles soulevées par la Charte. On peut espérer que, grâce à cet excellent travail préparatoire, un groupe de texte ou "building block" concernant les Droits fondamentaux est désormais modelé d'une façon qui rendra possible son intégration, vous le direz, sous une forme ou une autre, dans le futur Traité. Je crois que cela constituerait un progrès énorme sur notre chemin vers une Constitution jouissant de la confiance des citoyens européens. <BRK>

Vitorino (CE). – Mr President, as you have emphasised yourself, the political decision on both integrating the Charter into the Treaties and having the Union acceding to the Convention on Human Rights is for the plenary of the Convention. But for the group we can say that there is an overall consensus in orientation, thanks to a common understanding in the group on several key legal and technical issues relating both to the Charter and to accession to the European Convention on Human Rights.

I would like to emphasise, as you have done Mr President, that these results were achieved thanks to the expertise commitment of all members of the group, and of the very skillful and well-prepared work by the secretariat of the Convention, whom I would like to thank personally.

As far as the Charter is concerned, all members of the group either support it strongly and see it being incorporated in a form which would make the Charter legally binding and give it constitutional status, or they would not rule out giving favourable consideration to such incorporation.

As for the concrete form of incorporation, the group is well aware that it depends on the overall Treaty architecture. But the group would submit two basic options to this plenary, either of which would serve to make the Charter binding, and give it constitutional status:

1. The insertion of the text of the Charter articles at the beginning of the Constitutional treaty,

2. The insertion of an appropriate reference to the Charter in one article of the Treaty combined with annexing the Charter as a specific part of the Treaty or as a separate instrument, such as a protocol.

As the report emphasises, a large majority of the group is in favour of the first option. Some members prefer the second option, and one member of the group has submitted a third option, which, in his view, could be used to make the Charter legally binding, but without giving it constitutional status.

I would say that the basic starting point of the group's work is that the Charter, and the contents of the Charter, represent a consensus that has been reached by the previous Convention, and that consensus should be respected by the current Convention. Therefore, the group did not wish to reopen the discussion on the content of the Charter. The rights and principles of the Charter have thus remained untouched. Nevertheless, the group, with reservations from two of its members, proposes certain drafting adjustments in the so-called "horizontal provisions" of the Charter. These do not change the substance of the horizontal provisions which were enshrined in the Charter by the previous Convention, but on the contrary, these new horizontal provisions serve to confirm, or even to render clear and legally watertight, certain key elements on which, in substance, the previous Convention has already agreed.

These drafting adjustments meet some members' concerns about legal certainty, and they are inserted in our report to ensure a smooth incorporation of the Charter as a legally binding document.

I would just like to call your attention to the three main aspects of these horizontal clauses:

First of all, we wish to put forward for your consideration a strengthened clause in the Charter, rendering it absolutely clear that integrating the Charter in the Treaty will not lead to an extension of the Union's competencies. This is a principle that was adopted by the previous Convention; we are just re-emphasising it.

A second element is a clause clarifying that Charter rights that are based on the common constitutional tradition of Member States will be interpreted in harmony with those traditions.

The third clause clarifies the distinction between rights and principles in the Charter: a distinction which was already an important element of the overall consensus found in the previous Convention, but which is now spelled out in more detail. These are the three key elements of the new horizontal clauses.

Of course, there are other elements of the Charter that the group wants to submit for discussion. Firstly, regarding the Charter preamble. We believe this to be a crucial element of the Charter, and therefore it should be preserved in the future Constitutional Treaty framework.

Secondly, the explanations of the Charter, which were drawn up by the Presidium of the old Convention, are not part of the Charter as such, but could be considered as an exposé de motifs of the Charter. We however believe that those explanations are very important for the interpretation of the Charter, and therefore they should be taken into consideration, and be publicised more widely.

Finally, the report also signals the question to the Convention whether upon incorporation of the Charter the Treaty should still retain a reference to external sources of fundamental rights as currently found in Article 6.2 of the Treaty of the European Union - I mean the reference to the common constitutional tradition of Member States, and reference to the European Convention on Human Rights.

Now turning to the second part of our work, the accession of the Union to the European Convention on Human Rights. All members of the group either strongly support, or are ready to give favourable consideration to, the creation of a constitutional authorisation in the Treaty, to enable the Union to accede to the European Convention on Human Rights. I would like, once again, to emphasise that the Convention now only has to decide upon a possible insertion of such a constitution habitation in the Treaty. It will then be up to the Union's institutions, later on, notably for the Council taking the decision by unanimity, to decide when and how to open negotiations on such an accession, according to which technical modalities, and also to deal with the question of which additional protocols to the European Convention on Human Rights the Union should accede to. Those elements are simply subsequent elements of the major decision that we are supposed to discuss and take which is the constitutional habilitation to allow the Union to accede to the European Convention on Human Rights.

What are the main arguments that the group emphasises in favour of accession of the Union to the European Convention on Human Rights? First of all, it is a strong political signal for coherence between the Union and the greater Europe based on the Council of Europe, and the Strasbourg system of protection of fundamental rights.

Secondly, the fact that the Union accedes to the European Convention on Human Rights gives the citizens an analogous protection vis-à-vis Acts of the Union, as they already enjoy vis-à-vis legal Acts of Member States.

Thirdly, such an accession would ensure harmony in the case law of the two European Courts in human rights matters: the Luxembourg Court, and the Strasbourg Court.

We have also tried to dispel some of the fears that this option might raise. First of all, we believe in the group that such an accession does not threaten the principle of autonomy of Union law, or even the authority of the European Court of Justice. This is the opinion of the judges of both those Courts, and we believe that, at the end of the day, the autonomy of the Community legal system and the autonomy of the judicial /legal system of the European Union should be kept on the same basis as the autonomy of national law and the autonomy of national constitutional law courts and the autonomy of national supreme courts in regard to the European Convention on Human Rights. In our opinion, there is no difference between the two cases.

The group also stresses that the incorporation of the Charter and the accession to the European Convention are not alternatives but should be considered as complementary steps. The two steps together are, we believe, worthy of a constitution of the European Union.

The group's consensus was in favour of the clarification of certain key elements in this accession. First of all, we want to emphasise that accession to the Convention like the incorporation of the Charter in the Treaties, will not modify the division of competencies between the Union and the Member States. Therefore, we recommend the use of certain technical safeguards in order to make this point totally clear. There is no enlargement of the scope of competencies of the Union from the fact that the Union accedes to the European Convention on Human Rights.

Lastly, there is one final issue that has been discussed in the group, and to some extent this issue is independent from the integration of the Charter of Fundamental Rights into the Treaties, but nevertheless, we want to emphasise that if the Charter becomes legally binding, and gains constitutional status, this question of access to courts at European level may become a more relevant issue. Several members of the group have raised the issue of the possible reform of the conditions under which individuals may refer matters to the European Court of Justice on the basis of the current Article 230(4). A certain number of group members and some experts have pointed out during our discussions certain lacunae of judicial protection that might well exist in the current system of remedies. I would call your attention to some proposals that the European Ombudsman has put forward in this respect. On the other hand some members of the group felt that any possible reform of such a system of access to courts should be examined with great care, and that the current system of remedies should not be profoundly altered.

The group recommends this topic for further examination by the Convention in an appropriate context, together with other issues touching the statutes of the Courts, such as for instance, the present limits to the Court's jurisdiction in matters of justice and home affairs.

Finally, Mr President, I think we have achieved a conclusion that allows us to be optimistic about the final outcome of these two operations; enshrining the Charter in the Treaties and at the same time for the Union acceding to European Convention on Human Rights But it is ultimately up to you, Members of the Convention, to decide on that.

(Applause) <BRK>

Lopes (Ch.E/G.-PT). - Senhor Presidente, caros colegas, gostaria em primeiro lugar de felicitar o senhor comissário António Vitorino pela forma como dirigiu as reuniões do grupo de trabalho sobre a Carta dos Direitos Fundamentais. Recebi testemunho directo de que as conclusões que agora nos apresentou são naturalmente, e em primeiro lugar, o resultado de um esforço do compromisso entre os seus membros, mas que esse compromisso dificilmente teria sido possível sem a sua reconhecida competência técnica na matéria, o seu profissionalismo na condução das reuniões e a sua habilidade na procura dos consensos. Apoio as recomendações submetidas pelo grupo de trabalho tais como constam do respectivo relatório. A incorporação da Carta dos Direitos Fundamentais nos Tratados de forma a conferir-lhe um carácter vinculativo e a possibilidade de lhe ser, além disso, concedido estatuto constitucional marcarão, do meu ponto de vista, um progresso assinalável para a nossa União. O ser humano passa a ser indiscutivelmente o cerne da acção da União, tal como proclama o preâmbulo da Carta, que reafirma sem margem para dúvidas os valores indivisíveis e universais da dignidade do ser humano, da liberdade, da igualdade e da solidariedade.

As propostas de adaptação técnica dos chamados artigos horizontais necessárias à incorporação da Carta nos Tratados parecem-me soluções felizes. Não lhe introduzem alterações de substância e permitem responder às diferentes culturas, tradições constitucionais e jurídicas dos vários Estados-Membros. O grupo de trabalho recomenda também que seja incluída no novo Tratado uma autorização constitucional que possibilitará a adesão da União à Convenção Europeia dos Direitos Humanos. Dado o significado constitucional dessa possível adesão, caberá, porém, às instituições, nomeadamente ao Conselho, decidindo por unanimidade, iniciar as negociações para o efeito. É também uma recomendação que me parece política e juridicamente bem fundamentada. Essa adesão não modificará a divisão de competências entre os Estados-Membros e a União. A posição individual destes perante a Convenção de Estrasburgo também não será alterada. Mas, ao mesmo tempo, será dado um importante sinal político aos países europeus da chamada "grande Europa" do verdadeiro comprometimento da União com a promoção e a defesa dos Direitos humanos. Em resumo, congratulo-me com a qualidade do relatório apresentado a este plenário pelo grupo de trabalho da Carta e com o equilíbrio e o alcance das recomendações apresentadas. <BRK>

Méndez de Vigo (PE). - Señor Presidente, hace casi dos años, un día como hoy, en el salón plenario de aquí enfrente, la primera Convención aprobó la Carta de los Derechos Fundamentales de la Unión Europea, y veo a muchos amigos convencionales que estaban entonces allí.

Aquella Carta fue redactada como si fuera a integrarse en los Tratados, según la expresión del Presidente Hähnsh, pero esa decisión política pertenecía a una Conferencia Intergubernamental que decidió hacer de esa Carta una declaración política.

La delegación del Parlamento Europeo, que tuve el honor de presidir entonces, quería la integración de la Carta en los Tratados. Quería darle un valor jurídico constitucional, y ello porque la Carta es una garantía para la gente; es una garantía de que la Unión -y los Estados miembros-, cuando apliquen el Derecho comunitario, respetarán los derechos y libertades contenidos en la misma.

El Parlamento Europeo, en un informe que ha hecho Andrew Duff y que les hemos remitido a ustedes, aprobó la semana pasada en el Pleno de Estrasburgo una Resolución pidiendo nuevamente la integración de la Carta en la Constitución europea.

Por lo tanto, no podemos sino saludar y aprobar la propuesta que hoy nos hace el Comisario Vitorino, que ha dirigido, con el talento que todos conocemos, este Grupo de trabajo, al que quiero felicitar de corazón por el espléndido resultado de sus magníficas conclusiones. Estoy absolutamente de acuerdo con todo lo que dice en ellas y con los acuerdos que ha encontrado para las cláusulas horizontales.

Me gustaría obtener del Comisario, si es tan amable, alguna tranquilidad de espíritu en el sentido de que la referencia en el artículo 52.4 a las tradiciones constitucionales de los Estados miembros no supone, en la práctica, que se tengan que tener en cuenta todas las tradiciones constitucionales de los Estados miembros, como una referencia, como un mínimo común denominador indispensable.

Finalmente, en lo que respecta al armazón constitucional que ayer presentamos, en el artículo 6 de la Carta se contempla su integración en la Constitución con varias posibilidades. A título personal, creo que la Carta debe integrarse en su totalidad en una parte segunda de la Constitución europea.

Nada más, señor Presidente. He hablado menos de tres minutos porque el trabajo del Grupo Vitorino ha sido tan bueno que sólo merece nuestro agradecimiento. <BRK>

Arabadjiev (Parl.-BG). - Mr President, let me start by thanking chairman Vitorino and the other members of the working group for the opportunity of participating in the working group's discussions which resulted in this excellent report.

It is not at all my idea to confuse the debate on the Charter, with the preliminary debate on the preliminary direct constitutional treaty that is to take place later this morning. For this reason, though it may appear as a first reaction to Article 6 of the preliminary constitutional treaty, it is rather as a member of the working group on the Charter that I would like to note that I do not agree that the overall picture of the future Treaty should, in itself, prejudice the decision on the concrete form of incorporation.

I therefore firmly state at the outset that I confidently, and not as a mere conformist, belong to the large majority of the group, that would prefer the first option indicated in the report; that is insertion of the text of the Charter Articles at the beginning of the Constitutional Treaty in a title or chapter of that treaty. It is by virtue of this option, that the Charter would acquire to the greatest extent, the power of a fully binding text, and would make a decisive step towards a constitution for European citizens in line with the Laeken Declaration.

It is my understanding, that the present debate has the purpose of influencing the political decision about possible incorporation, and not go into the details about incorporation techniques. It is not simply a matter of technical adjustments however to have the drafting adjustments in the horizontal articles of the Charter, as proposed by the working group, especially with a view to the distinction between rights and principles.

In my view, the Charter articles do not explicitly distinguish between provisions which contain rights, and those which contain principles. It would therefore be a responsible approach to seek clarity by means of the proposed amendments, were the Charter to be incorporated in the future Constitutional Treaty.

Without necessarily sharing the concerns of those who would prefer to have the Charter out of the Treaty, and not merely for the sake of commanding a broad consensus, it is for the sake of legal clarity that the impact of provisions of a problematic character need to be clearly determined if the Charter is to have the status of positive law.

Finally, coming from a country which has so positively experienced the effect of the Strasbourg jurisprudence, and having some personal experience in the application of the ECHR, I would prefer not to put forward here any new arguments in favour of accession to that Convention.

I think, however, that it is legally important to introduce instruments that would ensure legal certainty and coherence, and avoid situations where EU Member States are held responsible before the European Court of Human Rights for acts performed pursuant to obligations imposed on those states by EU law.

I believe that it is possible to address and find solutions to these issues in the context of the accession of the EU to the European Convention. The scope of the accession would, by virtue of the very nature of the Union, be limited to areas in which the Union already has competence under the EU Treaties. <BRK>

Duff (PE). - Mr President, as Mr Mendez de Vigo has said, the European Parliament at Strasbourg last week passed with a great majority, a report that has contributed as CONV 368 to the Convention.

The purpose of this was to refresh the political story behind the drafting of the Charter, and to affirm with greater clarity than before, the Parliament's belief that the Charter carries great authority and legitimacy, and that it should now become mandatory with full constitutional status.

I think that the Parliament's resolution fully complements the excellent work of Mr Vitorino's working group, and I congratulate Commissioner Vitorino for having brokered what was clearly a complex agreement. He seems to have tolerated protracted semantic arguments with little legal effect. It seems that some of the proposed revised clauses are simply statements of the obvious, but if the revision of those clauses is the price we have to pay for the installation of the Charter at the centre of the integration process, then I and my colleagues from the Parliament will be prepared to accept them.

I would however have to say that we would greatly appreciate at the present stage of the debate, a clear commitment from the British government that they are also now prepared to accept the confirmation of a mandatory status for the Charter. <BRK>

Van der Linden (Parl.-NL). - Voorzitter, ik zou graag willen beginnen met een groot compliment aan commissaris Vitorino die deze werkgroep zo zorgvuldig, deskundig en standvastig heeft voorgezeten en die een resultaat op tafel heeft gelegd dat een afspiegeling vormt van de discussies. En met collega Duff zou ik aan de Britse regering willen zeggen: hier ligt een resultaat dat rekening houdt met de wensen van de Britse regering en dat ons dus machtigt ook haar te vragen om een inspanning te doen om dit resultaat mee te onderschrijven.

Het gaat om de plaats van de grondrechten in de toekomstige Unie. Voor de legitimiteit van de Europese Unie en voor het vertrouwen van de Europese burger in de handelingen van die Unie is het respect voor de mensenrechten door de instellingen van de Europese Unie van groot belang. De Europese Unie is van een economische gemeenschap, een kolen- en staalgemeenschap, na de Top van

Rome in 1989 gegroeid naar een politieke unie, en gaat nu in de richting van een waardengemeenschap. De kern van die waardengemeenschap is juist het Handvest, dat zijn de mensenrechten. Dat is de ziel en het hart van het nieuwe Verdrag. Daarom hoort het mijns inziens ook thuis in een constituerend verdrag: hoe kunnen wij de burgers uitleggen dat een kernstuk - een "building block", zoals Vitorino het noemt - als bijlage aan een verdrag zou worden gehecht? Juist omdat het een kernstuk is, hoort het thuis in het Verdrag, ook omdat wij de burgers duidelijk willen maken welke de belangrijkste gegevens zijn van die Europese Unie. Ik ben dus een voorstander van integrale opname in het Verdrag zelf.

Met betrekking tot de toetreding tot het EVRM-Verdrag committeert de Europese Unie zich nu aan de mensenrechtenstandaards waaraan ook de lidstaten gebonden zijn. Het voorkomt dubbele standaards en selectief winkelen. Het Handvest moet niet gezien worden als een alternatief voor het EVRM-Verdrag maar als een aanvullend instrument. Het bevordert - en dat vind ik eigenlijk het belangrijkste - een rechtsruimte voor Europa in de ruimere zin des woords, met een consistent mensenrechtenbeschermingssysteem in Europa als geheel. Het is dus een natuurlijke en logische stap.

Toetreding maakt een einde aan de rechtsonduidelijkheid dat de lidstaten wel lid zijn van het EVRM-Verdrag, maar de Europese Unie niet. De burgers krijgen dezelfde mate van rechtsbescherming jegens de Unie als die welke ze nu reeds hebben jegens haar lidstaten. Toetreding zal ook de harmonieuze ontwikkeling van de rechtspraak van de beide hoven bevorderen en, wat ik heel belangrijk vind, geeft een politiek belangrijk signaal dat mensenrechten binnen en buiten de Europese Unie hetzelfde betekenen. Bovendien voldoen wij hiermee aan de resoluties van het Europees Parlement - collega Duff heeft daarover gesproken - en van de Raad van Europa. Bij dat laatste zou ik nog willen zeggen dat de Raad van Europa, met volksvertegenwoordigers uit 44 landen van Europa als geheel, zich bij meerdere gelegenheden uitgesproken heeft voor toetreding van de Europese Unie tot het EVRM-Verdrag, juist om te zorgen dat er sprake is van één rechtsruimte op het punt van de mensenrechten in Europa als geheel.

Voorzitter, het is evident dat ik er voorstander van ben dat de Europese Unie tot het EVRM-Verdrag toetreedt en dat het Handvest op die manier juridisch bindend wordt en een constitutionele status krijgt. <BRK>

Hain (Ch.E/G.-GB). - Mr President, can I thank you first of all for your warm congratulations on my promotion to the British Cabinet, and if I could give you the bad news, I intend to stay on as the Government representative in the Convention, to the end.

I want to congratulate Antonio Vitorino and the group on the work they have done. There is a consensus that the Charter has never been easy to achieve, and I believe we should welcome the Working Group's achievement. I want to thank Antonio, particularly, for his own hard work, his ingenuity, and his flexibility in achieving this consensus. Their excellent report will be a key building block as we begin to look at the shape of a new constitution for Europe.

That constitution must refer to the rights of our citizens and it must be firmly rooted in the Member States' democracies, so no extension of legal competencies, as the Commissioner said himself. I am clear that without this, we cannot have a constitution that meets the need of Europe and its people.

My government has always made clear that we support the Charter as an excellent way of enshrining important values across Europe. Equally, we have made clear that there are issues of what Antonio Vitorino called "legal certainty" that would need to be resolved before we could consider its incorporation into the Treaty. We are ready now to give favourable consideration to the recommendations on this in the report.

In particular, we support the very important technical amendments to the so-called "horizontal provisions" recommended by the group, and we are grateful for them. Crucially, they help clarify its legal intentions. A legal Charter, which is unclear in meaning, would be bad for the citizens and bad for the Member States. It would be counterproductive for the European Union too. The Working Group report also speaks of further work to enrich and publicise the detailed technical explanations that are associated with the Charter. The explanations are a vital part of the overall Charter package. The Commissioner referred to this, and I hope that he may be able to say a little more today about how he proposes to take that vital work forward.

The Working Group has wisely left to the plenary the major political question about an appropriate form of incorporation. Although I agree that the final decision requires us to be clearer about the future architecture of the Treaties, I believe that we can now see the great merit in preserving the integrity of the Charter as a complete and self-contained statement of rights, freedoms and principles. This can be achieved by constructing a simple bridge between the new constitutional Treaty and the Charter, perhaps by the inclusion of an Article in the new Constitution, specifically referring to the Charter, which would then remain a separate document. This would give appropriate weight and status to the Charter, without compromising the simplicity and clarity of the Constitutional Treaty. So in that sense, we do not support the first option; we support the second one.

The rights and freedoms of our citizens, and the principles that inspire the Union, should have prominence in the new constitution we are devising. This report allows us to see how that might be achieved. To put the disagreements we have had behind us, it is to be warmly welcomed, and in specific answer to the question asked by Andrew Duff and others, provided we stick firmly to the approach here, and provided we pursue the second option, yes, we are ready to work towards incorporation. <BRK>

Fayot (Parl.-LU). – Oui, Monsieur le Président, la Charte des droits fondamentaux est un signal important en vue d'une Constitution européenne. Celle-ci doit mettre le citoyen européen au centre de la construction européenne. Elle doit se préoccuper d'énoncer clairement ses droits et devoirs et les moyens pour y arriver pour autant que cela soit de la compétence de l'Europe. En incorporant, comme je le souhaite, la totalité de la Charte dans une Constitution européenne, nous en faisons un texte contraignant qui donne des droits effectifs aux citoyens communautaires. Je voudrais, pour ma part, insister tout particulièrement sur le chapitre social. Certes, nous savons qu'il y a de multiples restrictions et limitations dans le texte de la Charte lui-même.

Il n'en reste pas moins que ce chapitre est une indication importante pour le respect du modèle social européen et des principes essentiels de l'Etat social. Que nous ayons atteint cela, je voudrais le souligner également, est le grand mérite du Commissaire Vitorino, qui a déployé d'importants efforts afin d'atteindre le consensus, tâche moins facile qu'il n'y paraissait de prime abord.

Monsieur le Président, le groupe de travail a renvoyé une décision importante à la Convention elle-même. C'est, comme le prévoit la Charte elle-même dans son article 47, le droit à la protection juridictionnelle effective des citoyens. Je pense que le groupe de travail a eu raison de le faire parce que la question ne se limite pas à la protection juridique relative aux droits fondamentaux. Elle concerne également les actes communautaires en général.

On sait qu'à l'heure actuelle, il incombe aux Etats membres de prévoir des voies de recours et des procédures permettant d'assurer le respect du droit des individus à une protection juridictionnelle effective en matière européenne. L'article 230, paragraphe 4, ne permet le recours direct d'un citoyen devant la Cour de justice européenne que de façon très restrictive. Or, nous voulons rapprocher l'Union du citoyen. Dans un tel système, la protection juridique des citoyens face à la machine institutionnelle est une pièce maîtresse. A cet égard, trois réformes sont essentielles selon moi. En premier lieu, il n'est pas acceptable que la loi communautaire n'offre pas de protection juridictionnelle à des individus qui voudraient contester des mesures communautaires directement applicables. En deuxième lieu, la juridiction de la Cour de justice européenne doit être étendue à toutes les Institutions et à tous les organes de l'Union, comme le dit la Charte, d'ailleurs, expressément à l'article 51.1. Or l'article 230 ne parle que de la légalité des actes des Institutions, qui n'est qu'une partie de ce qui se passe dans l'Union européenne. Et, en troisième lieu, la juridiction doit être étendue à toutes les mesures de l'Union alors, qu'à l'heure actuelle, l'activité de la Cour est limitée. Je pense que la question se pose même si dans l'état actuel de la législation européenne, dans le domaine juridictionnel, cette législation est en accord avec les exigences de la Charte et de la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme. Je pense donc Monsieur le Président, que dans la Constitution que nous allons rédiger, devra figurer le droit du citoyen à une protection juridictionnelle effective et sans lacunes. <BRK>

Duhamel (PE). – Monsieur le Président, je ne voudrais pas briser le consensus, je voudrais aider à bien l'identifier, ce qui implique une franchise nécessaire.

Un très large consensus existe pour incorporer la Charte des droits fondamentaux dans notre Union. Ce consensus existe au sein de la Convention et nos débats l'ont amplement démontré. Mais il existe peut-être encore plus dans la société civile. Impossible de ne pas l'avoir entendu. Certes, un petit nombre de gouvernements sont plus ou moins réticents. On peut comprendre que le groupe de travail ait voulu les apaiser. On ne comprendrait pas tous en tout cas que la Convention en vienne à leur céder. Ne décevons pas les citoyens européens, ne touchons pas inutilement à la Charte. Les adjonctions proposées me paraissent parfois inutiles, parfois rétrogrades, et toujours très fâcheuses.

Par exemple, sont inutiles les adjonctions des articles 52.4 et 52.5 sur les traditions constitutionnelles nationales, les législations nationales, les pratiques nationales. Rien n'y figure qui ne soit déjà dans la Charte. Inutiles sont les incantations qu'on veut ajouter aux articles 51.1 et 51.2 sur le champ d'application limité aux compétences de l'Union. L'article 51.2 dans le texte de la Charte est déjà redondant par rapport à l'article 51.1. Cette répétition avait été faite pour rassurer. A ce rythme-là, on finira par écrire 10 fois de suite que la Charte ne crée aucune compétence nouvelle, que la Charte ne crée aucune compétence nouvelle, que la Charte ne crée aucune compétence nouvelle ou, pourquoi pas dix, quinze, vingt fois.

Lorsque les propositions ne sont pas inutiles, elles peuvent devenir rétrogrades. C'est le cas de l'article 52.5 nouveau qui est proposé. Il s'agit ici de la distinction entre les droits et les principes consacrés par la Charte. Cette question est déjà traitée par l'article 51.1. Il dispose que l'Union et les Etats membres, lorsqu'ils mettent en oeuvre le droit de l'Union, respectent les droits fondamentaux tandis qu'ils en observent les principes et en promeuvent l'application. Avec le nouveau texte proposé, il serait désormais affirmé que les principes peuvent être mis en oeuvre. A première vue, on exprime une évidence. En effet, on imagine mal que les principes ne puissent pas être mis en oeuvre. Après examen, on mesure le recul et d'ailleurs la contradiction. L'article 51 inchangé affirme que l'Union et les Etats promeuvent l'application. Dans le texte anglais "they shall promote", le nouvel article 52.5 suggère de faire marche arrière, les principes peuvent être mis en oeuvre. En anglais "may be implemented". Il est évident qu'ils ne seront mis en oeuvre que lorsqu'on voudra les mettre en oeuvre. Mais voyez la portée symbolique d'un tel recul. On passe de l'affirmation de valeurs et de principes que la politique s'efforcera de mettre en oeuvre à l'énoncé étriqué d'éventualités limitées. Est-ce là le message que nous voulons envoyer sur l'avenir de l'Europe?

A sans arrêt rassurer quelque gouvernement, d'ailleurs très minoritaire, vous risquez de désespérer la société civile. Par conséquent, je propose qu'on ne le fasse pas. Ne touchons pas à la Charte. <BRK>

Meyer (Parl.-DE). - Herr Präsident, liebe Kolleginnen und Kollegen! Ich habe zweimal als Gast an der Arbeitsgruppe, die Kommissar Vitorino geleitet hat, teilgenommen und dabei ist meine Bewunderung für seinen Sachverstand und sein diplomatisches Geschick - soweit das noch überhaupt möglich war - noch gestiegen! Durch die Rechtsverbindlichkeit der Charta wird ein großer Schritt gemacht, der deutlich werden lässt: Die Europäische Union ist nicht nur eine Wirtschaftsgemeinschaft und Währungsunion, sie ist auch eine Wertegemeinschaft. Mit den Worten von Romano Prodi kann man sagen: Sie ist die künftige Seele der Europäischen Union.

Was nun die Klarstellungen angeht, zu denen der Kollege Duhamel sich geäußert hat, ist meine Auffassung, dass diese Klarstellungen unnötig sind, aber ich betone auch, sie sind unschädlich, und sie waren eine Bedingung dafür, dass in der Arbeitsgruppe Konsens erreicht werden konnte; aus diesem Grunde wurde diese Klarstellung an drei Stellen, die keine inhaltliche Veränderung ist - das betone ich noch einmal -, vereinbart. Ich will aber auch eindeutig betonen, hinsichtlich der Aufnahme der Charta in die Verfassung bin ich für die erste Option. Eine Verfassung, die in ihrem Text keine Grundrechte enthält, sondern nur auf diese verweist, verdient nicht den Namen Verfassung!

Was die Präambel angeht, unterstütze ich mit Nachdruck den Vorschlag der Arbeitsgruppe, diese auch zur Präambel der künftigen Verfassung zu machen. Im Strukturvorschlag, den Präsident Giscard d'Estaing gestern vorgestellt hat, ist unter der Überschrift Präambel kein Text. Ich möchte das so verstehen, dass es bisher jedenfalls inhaltlich nichts Besseres gibt als diese Präambel. Ich erinnere daran, dass wir im ersten Konvent lange über den Inhalt der Präambel debattiert haben, die auch Gegenstand von Kompromissen war, und dieses sollten wir in diesem Konvent nicht wiederholen.

Was den Beitritt zur europäischen Menschenrechtskonvention angeht, sollten wir uns keine unnötigen Probleme bereiten. Über den Beitritt selbst entscheiden die neue Verfassung und dieser Konvent nicht, sondern es geht nur um die Möglichkeit des Beitritts. Diese Möglichkeit kann in der Verfassung sichergestellt werden, und wie Kommissar Vitorino eben gesagt hat, bedarf es dann zur Aufnahme von Verhandlungen nach geltendem Recht eines einstimmigen Ratsbeschlusses.

Diese Grundrechtecharta als rechtsverbindliches Dokument ist ein wichtiges Signal an die neuen Mitgliedsländer. Dort gibt es viele Menschen, die fürchten, was aus Brüssel an Machtausübung auf sie zukommt, und denen können wir gemeinsam sagen: Ihr kommt in eine Gemeinschaft, die unter der Herrschaft der Menschenrechte steht, und wenn aus Brüssel eure Rechte verletzt werden, dann werdet ihr dagegen geschützt durch die Grundrechtecharta! Ihr könnt Vertrauen haben, wenn ihr in die Europäische Union kommt!

Dastis (Ch.E./G.-ES). - Señor Presidente, quisiera, en primer lugar, felicitar al Comisario Vitorino por la excelente labor que ha desarrollado presidiendo el Grupo de trabajo y apoyar resueltamente la conclusión de incorporar la Carta a nuestro futuro Tratado constitucional.

En cuanto a la modalidad concreta de esa incorporación, creo, a la vista de la arquitectura de Tratado Constitucional que nos fue presentada ayer, que la que mejor se adapta es la modalidad segunda: la de un artículo en dicho Tratado y la inclusión de la Carta como documento anejo.

Quisiera también apoyar el esfuerzo de compromiso realizado en la modificación de la redacción de las cláusulas horizontales. Creo que es un esfuerzo que vale la pena para lograr el consenso que todos deseamos. En este contexto, quisiera resaltar la importancia de las explicaciones para suministrar una interpretación auténtica de la Carta y la necesidad de reforzar la seguridad jurídica, evitando que su contenido quede afectado de manera indirecta por políticas comunitarias en el futuro.

En cuanto a la adhesión de la Unión al Convenio Europeo de Derechos Humanos, creemos apropiado que se incluya una cláusula permitiendo, habilitando para que se tome esa decisión en el futuro, pero esa decisión deberá ser tomada por la Unión en el futuro, una vez que se estudie si es posible hacerla sin menoscabar la autonomía del Derecho comunitario, sin modificar el reparto de competencias entre la Unión y los Estados miembros y sin afectar a la posición de los Estados miembros en dicho Convenio. <BRK>

Roche (Ch.E./G.-IE). - Thanks first of all to Commissioner Vitorino and to his colleagues for a very constructive, careful and thoughtful piece of work.

The protection and promotion of human rights must be at the very heart of the European project. As a past human rights fellow of the United Nations, this is particularly significant to me. The Charter remains a clear and comprehensive statement of where we stand collectively. It is an important and an accessible listing of the values, principles which underpin the Union's identity and its purpose. This is particularly important at a period of change.

The Charter's future status is a central part of the work of the Convention. It is a question that gives rise to complex issues. We need to ensure that not only are human rights fully protected and respected, but that this is done in a way that is clear and effective. Many of these difficult issues are identified and teased out in the excellent work of the working group. I welcome, in particular, the progress that has been made in relation to the Charter's horizontal provisions which define its scope and application. In my view, the Working Group took the right approach, by not reopening questions of substance in the Charter, while producing or proposing amendments to further confirm key elements of the overall consensus on which the Convention has agreed.

This is very useful and solid work, and will give enormous benefit to the wider Convention when it comes to drawing up the final recommendations.

The working group's mandate made it clear that it was not to get involved in the question of whether the Charter should be incorporated. Rather it was to assume a political decision to move towards incorporation, and to examine the specific matters that would then arise. The political decision on the Charter's place, in any new Treaty remains to be taken and clearly, depends crucially on the nature and the scope of the Treaty itself. There is no need to rush to judgement at this stage. The report has set out proposals that merit careful and thoughtful consideration.

There is also some further technical work to be done, including the status of the explanatory notes, on the articles sources, produced by the Charter Convention Presidium. My immediate preference, as regard to the techniques of incorporation, would be for further explanation of the approach set out at Option B. This would involve insertion of an appropriate reference to the Charter in an Article of the Treaty. This, I believe would be the most fruitful approach.

The group, of course, also studied the question of accession to the European Convention on Human Rights. Again, I welcome the very careful, and thoughtful work that has been done on this issue. Broadly, I can support, in principle, and subject to further detailed work, the concept of the European Union accession to the Convention, as set out in the report.

Finally, I would like to reiterate my strong support for the Charter, as an expression of the rights and values which underpin this Union, and to which we are all committed. The question this Convention must address, is not whether we are for or against Human Rights, there can be absolute no ambiguity in that regard, but rather how it can best be rendered effectively and meaningfully for our citizens. <BRK>

Einem (Parl.-AT). - Herr Präsident! Vier kurze Anmerkungen. Erstens, ich war Mitglied der ersten Charta-Konvention, also des ersten Konvents zur Arbeit an der Charta, und nach dem Verständnis, das wir dort hatten, ist die Charta der Ausdruck der gemeinsamen Verfassungstraditionen der Mitgliedstaaten in einer aktualisierten und im Text zusammengefassten Weise. Daher verstehe ich den Artikel 52 Absatz 4 der neu formulierten Übergangsbestimmungen nicht wirklich, denn er könnte eine Einschränkung auf nationale Besonderheiten nach sich ziehen.

Zweitens, Artikel 52 Absatz 5 wie von der Arbeitsgruppe vorgeschlagen, ist für mich entweder eine dramatische Einschränkung der Charta und ihrer Anwendbarkeit oder überflüssig. Ich glaube, darüber muss man noch einmal reden. Drittens, nach unserer Auffassung muss die Charta ein Bestandteil der europäischen Verfassung sein, das heißt, der Text muss in der Verfassung sein. Viertens, ich möchte durchaus anerkennen, dass die Regierung des Vereinigten Königreichs ihre Haltung weiter entwickelt hat. <BRK>

Kaufmann (PE). - Herr Präsident! Ich möchte zu den Erläuterungen und zu den horizontalen Artikeln etwas sagen. Ich selbst war damals Mitglied im Grundrechtekonvent, und ich habe in Bezug auf die Erläuterungen die Verwirrung miterlebt, die damals die Präsentation dieses Dokuments ausgelöst hat. Der Grundrechtekonvent selbst hat damals ausdrücklich abgelehnt, sich diese Erläuterung als Dokument zu eigen zu machen. Deshalb steht auch in dem Dokument mit der Nummer Konvent 49 ausdrücklich: "Die vorliegenden Erläuterungen sind vom Präsidium in eigener Verantwortung formuliert worden." Das heißt, die Erläuterungen sind kein Arbeitsdokument des Grundrechtekonvents, und sie gehen auch nicht auf einen Beschluss des Grundrechtekonvents selbst zurück. Insofern muss ich sagen, dass für mich nicht akzeptabel ist, wenn jetzt diese Erläuterungen in einer besonderen Weise hervorgehoben werden und aus meiner Sicht damit nachträglich durch die Hintertür die Erläuterungen eine Legitimation erhalten sollen, die der damalige Konvent ihnen nicht gegeben hat.

Zur horizontalen Bestimmung, vor allen Dingen zum Artikel 52: Wir haben im damaligen Grundrechtekonvent heftig darüber gestritten, ob die Charta zwischen subjektiven Rechten und objektiven Grundsätzen unterscheiden solle. Damals war allen Beteiligten klar, dass Grundrechte als objektive Grundsätze zwar gleichfalls verbindlich sind, dass aber Einzelne ihre Einhaltung nicht selbst einklagen können würden. Im Grundrechtekonvent wurde damals ein sehr wichtiger Kompromiss erzielt. Die große Mehrheit des Konvents, die keinesfalls bloß objektive Grundsätze in der Charta sehen wollte, stimmte damals zu. Im Gegenzug erklärten sich aber andere Konventsmitglieder damit einverstanden, dass man in den horizontalen Bestimmungen darauf verzichtet, zwischen Rechten und Grundsätzen zu unterscheiden. Deshalb muss ich sagen, habe ich mich sehr gewundert über den Vorschlag, der jetzt von der Arbeitsgruppe ausgearbeitet wurde. Ich teile die Meinung von Herrn Duhamel, dass es hier um einen Rückschritt handelt und nicht, wie Herr Meyer sagt, nur um eine Klarstellung der horizontalen Bestimmung. <BRK>

López Garrido (Parl.-ES). - Señor Presidente, quiero destacar que en el Grupo de trabajo al que he tenido el honor de pertenecer ha habido un amplísimo consenso sobre tres elementos esenciales de la Carta de los Derechos Fundamentales.

Primero, que su contenido es el que se acordó hace dos años y que tiene el apoyo unánime de esta Convención. Segundo, que se trata de una Carta que va a tener un carácter legalmente vinculante, jurídicamente vinculante, e invocable ante los Tribunales. Tercero, que tiene un estatus constitucional.

Sobre esto ha habido un amplísimo consenso, una amplísima mayoría en el Grupo de trabajo y -es importante destacarlo- porque, sin duda, la Carta de los Derechos Fundamentales constituye el mayor elemento de vinculación, de contacto con los ciudadanos que va a haber a lo largo de los trabajos de esta Convención. El mayor elemento seguramente de legitimación y de acercamiento de Europa, de la construcción europea, a los ciudadanos. Por cierto, una construcción europea que en estos momentos coincide con una ampliación a países, que en algunos casos no han tenido una larga tradición democrática. Va a ser importantísimo para ellos entrar en una construcción que tiene esa base de consolidación democrática y de defensa de derechos fundamentales.

Y además, la Carta de los Derechos Fundamentales es un pilar básico de la futura Constitución Europea. Desde la Revolución francesa sabemos que una Constitución, básicamente, proclama dos cosas: derechos fundamentales y división de poderes. Los derechos fundamentales están en esta Carta, que recibirá sin duda un espaldarazo de este Pleno, y falta un elemento básico, sin duda importante, que es la división de poderes. Pero forma parte de los valores de Europa una Carta de los Derechos Fundamentales, en la cual, por cierto, se incluye un capítulo esencial que es la solidaridad, que no he visto reflejado en el esqueleto de Tratado Constitucional que ayer se presentó a esta Convención. La solidaridad debe formar parte de los valores de la Unión Europea y no he visto reflejado esto en los primeros artículos del proyecto de Tratado Constitucional.

Creemos que el preámbulo de la Carta debe insertarse como parte del preámbulo de la Constitución Europea y que, además, la Constitución Europea debe tener una parte visible, una primera parte muy visible, que es la Carta de los Derechos Fundamentales. Creo que debe ser la parte primera de la Constitución y no ser relegada a un Protocolo, como si quisiéramos ocultarla, hacerla difícil de ver para los ciudadanos. Los ciudadanos tienen que ver, al leer la Constitución, que lo primero que hay es una Carta de los Derechos Fundamentales; por eso, claramente apoyo la primera opción: que forme parte de la Constitución Europea y que no sea relegada, como si fuera algo inconfesable, algo que queremos ocultar, a una parte secundaria.

Por último, en cuanto al debate sobre las cláusulas horizontales, yo creo que son innecesarias las modificaciones que se han hecho, pero me parece que no alteran esencialmente el texto. Debemos firmar el Convenio Europeo de los Derechos Humanos -es una forma de homogeneizar la protección de los derechos humanos en Europa- y el control judicial de los derechos humanos de la Carta de los Derechos Fundamentales tiene que ser explicado, detallado y precisado, y en ese sentido apoyo la propuesta que ha hecho Ben Fayot anteriormente.

Por último, quiero decir que todo esto me lleva a apoyar el informe final, elaborado en ese Grupo de trabajo, que ha requerido un alto grado de consenso, en el que ha habido concesiones de todas las partes, y en donde hay, sin duda, un trabajo importante de fondo del Comisario Vitorino, al que quiero agradecer su trabajo eficiente y lúcido. Estoy convencido de que este Pleno va a dar el espaldarazo a la Carta de los Derechos Fundamentales, que convertirá definitivamente a esta Convención en una asamblea constituyente. <BRK>

Le Président. – Je voudrais simplement signaler à Monsieur López Garrido qu'on parle de solidarité dans le titre de l'article 4 et que dans les articles article 2 ou 3, la référence à la solidarité sera explicite. Donc, il n'y a pas de lacune à cet égard. Nous n'avons pas tout mis dans le détail. Mais naturellement, cette notion fondamentale ne sera pas oubliée. <BRK>

Kutskova (Gouv.-BG). - Mr President, dear colleagues, I am glad to express my support for the final report, as member of the working group on the Charter of Fundamental Rights. I am glad that we succeeded in producing a document of normal majority and minority opinions. This now makes the consensual decision of the incorporation of the Charter possible. Finding such a balance was not an easy task. Therefore, let me congratulate all the members of the working group for their constructive attitudes, and especially Mr Vitorino, for his excellent and diplomatic chairmanship.

As already stated by the Bulgarian Government, we favour the incorporation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights into the future Constitutional Treaty, thus giving it a legally binding character. The European citizens will support a constitution where the protection of fundamental rights is given a central place.

As for the technique for the incorporation of the Charter, both suggested options have comparative advantages. We would, however, prefer the B option, which would provide a more balanced and concise institutional text. Let me emphasise the role of the drafting adjustments to the Charter's general provisions, should it be incorporated. Without touching on the substance of the Charter's provisions, these adjustments could be very important for the legal certainty in the area of human rights. Strengthening the horizontal clauses might prove to be an essential consensus-building element. These provisions guarantee the application of subsidiarity.

Another point concerns the explanations of the Presidium of the previous Convention, as well as those of the working group itself. On the one hand, these are very helpful to candidate countries, who did not participate in the previous Convention. On the other hand, although having no legal value, they do have particular importance for the interpretation of the Charter provisions and, in particular, for the distinction between rights and principles.

The Group left the question open, as to whether the Constitutional Treaty should refer to the external sources of inspiration for fundamental rights - in particular, the constitutional traditions, and the European Convention on Human Rights. In my view, we should bear in mind that the Union exists in a dynamic environment, in which human rights will continue to develop. Therefore, referring to external sources would help enrich Union law, and give additional protection to its citizens.

Finally, endowing the Union with a single legal personality will almost mean that it will have the constitutional right to accede to the European Convention on Human Rights. The modalities of accession should be discussed only as a complementary step to the Charter's incorporation. <BRK>

MacCormick (PE). - Mr President, since I am somebody who does not spend all his time praising the works of the Government of his own country, I would particularly like to express my gratitude to Peter Hain, for saying so clearly today, that he, on behalf of the United Kingdom government, would be willing to accept this text, with the adjustments that have been suggested.

That really is an important step forward, and if I may say so, in her presence, it is also important to pay respect to Baroness Scotland, who in the working group was very good-natured and persuaded us, including sceptics like myself, that some adjustments of this kind were necessary. That really was a very important step forward.

After all, we have spent quite a lot of time discussing how important it is for the institutions of the Union to be limited in respect of the principles of subsidiarity and the principle of proportionality. It is, of course, important to have these limits on the institutions of the Union. But how absurd it would be, if we had them, but did not at the same time require the institutions of the Union, under binding force of law, to respect the fundamental rights of the citizens of the Union. That is absolutely critical to constituting a new European Union in a proper manner. Now that we have taken the steps that the working group under Commissioner Vitorino has recommended, we are in a position to do just that.

Secondly, the greatest fear, and I think, the best founded one, of those who were doubtful about the idea of a Charter of Rights as a binding part of the constitution, was that it could undermine the Court at Strasbourg, and the valuable tradition of the European Convention on Human Rights, and as Commissioner Vitorino said, the greater Europe that has subscribed, all along, to the Convention on Human Rights. I think that this document guarantees that the incorporation of our own Charter, internal to Union law will not externally undermine the European Convention on Human Rights, or the Court at Strasbourg. This is also something that many of us hold absolutely vital and fundamental.

In that respect, the proposal that having recognised the personality of the Union, we should encourage the Council to accede to the Convention is all-important, and in all these respects I would like to give my full-hearted support to the proposals of the working group, and thank Mr Vitorino for the work he did in chairing it. <BRK>

Kocaoglu (Parl.-TR). - Mr President, effective protection of fundamental rights is not only the main moral obligation at the EU, but also one of the most important sources of its legitimacy.

However, unlike the situation in its Member States, the protection of fundamental human rights within the EU, has so far been an issue which has lagged behind developments in other fields, for example the completion of the internal market. As the EU is increasingly becoming part of the day-to-day lives of the millions of people living in Europe, the protection of fundamental rights of individuals against its acts is highly relevant in the debate on EU legitimacy.

There are two components for a better protection of fundamental rights within the EU. Firstly, a clear-cut catalogue of fundamental rights of a constitutional nature and secondly, an external control of its implementation. The former involves the incorporation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights into the Constitutional Treaty, whereas the latter entails the accession of the EU to the European Convention on Human Rights.

For this reason, I welcome the report of the working group, and the recommendations made therein. The members of this Convention must now discharge their historic responsibilities, by expressing a strong political will to make it happen.

Once a political consensus to this end is reached among the members of the Convention, the remaining legal and technical issues, as successfully addressed by this report, are I believe, surmountable. In order to reduce potential legal complexities, I would suggest the incorporation of the Charter by way of a reference in an Article of the Constitutional Treaty, to which the Charter itself, is attached.

I generally support the idea behind the proposed drafting adjustments in the horizontal articles of the Charter. However, given their highly technical nature, I think they should be revisited, particularly after the final decision of the Convention regarding the exact form of incorporation. I am in favour of the continuation of the reference to external sources of inspiration for fundamental rights, currently made in Article 6, paragraph 2 of the EU Treaty.

I understand the approach of the report, but I think the contents of the Charter should be left intact, as it was endorsed by the Nice European Council. However, when we talk about fundamental rights, we cannot ignore the reality of the 10 million long-term residents of third country nationals within the EU. This issue should also be addressed by the Commission.

As for the accession of the EU to the European Convention on Human Rights, I believe that the first bold step must be taken by this Convention. The Union must open itself to the control of the pan-European human rights system of the Council of Europe, as has long been done by the Member States themselves. I support all the arguments in favour listed within the report. <BRK>

Haenel (Parl.-FR). – Merci, Monsieur le Président. Concernant la Charte tout d'abord, je ne peux qu'applaudir aux conclusions du groupe pour avoir moi-même participé aux travaux de la première Convention. Je ne pourrais pas imaginer que notre Convention ne se prononce pas en faveur d'une intégration de ces dispositions sous une forme qui les rendent juridiquement obligatoires. Nous le disions à l'époque. La Charte rappelle les fondations de l'Europe, les fondamentaux du pourquoi on est ensemble. Elle était considérée comme le préalable à la démarche constitutionnelle. Pour ma part, je tiens à le souligner auprès de mon ami Monsieur Vitorino, je tiens beaucoup à ce que tout le préambule soit incorporé dans un article premier pimpant de la Constitution avec la même valeur que l'ensemble des articles. En ce qui concerne le statut des explications, je me souviens que dans cette première Convention, j'étais le voisin de Lord Goldsmith et que ce dernier avait considéré qu'il ne donnerait son accord que s'il y avait des explications qui, par la suite, devaient éclairer la lecture des articles de la Charte et, notamment, en faciliter l'interprétation. Par conséquent, il est très important qu'on rementionne aujourd'hui ces explications qui font, en quelque sorte, partie intégrante de l'ensemble du dispositif.

Pour ce qui est de l'adhésion à la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme, en revanche, le rapport du groupe de travail me laisse dans l'incertitude. En effet, je suis réservé. En matière de protection des droits, nous avons tous tendance à penser que deux garanties valent mieux qu'une. La Charte constitue une première garantie, l'adhésion à la Convention européenne en ajouterait une seconde. De ce fait, quel est celui d'entre nous qui ne serait pas tenté dans un premier mouvement, un mouvement d'ensemble bannière au vent, de répondre qu'il faut ajouter cette deuxième protection à la première. Etant juriste de formation, je sais par expérience que dans les matières juridiques, le mieux est parfois l'ennemi du bien. Ce qu'il faut avant tout, c'est que le citoyen comprenne les voies de recours qui lui sont offertes et qu'il puisse obtenir assez rapidement la réponse du juge. Je m'interroge à ce sujet sur les effets que pourrait avoir l'adhésion à la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme. Je me pose deux questions. Premièrement, a-t-on bien mesuré les conséquences de cette adhésion sur l'allongement des délais de procédure? J'ai fait mes calculs. En moyenne, on arrive à une dizaine d'années. Le problème est de savoir si on y adhère pour les juristes et les avocats ou pour les citoyens. Deuxièmement, dès lors que les dispositions de la Charte deviennent contraignantes, l'adhésion à la Convention apporte-t-elle une protection nouvelle réelle et cela compense-t-il le surcroît de complexité du système puisque toute la Convention est dans la Charte. Les explications orales que nous a données tout à l'heure sur cette deuxième partie le Commissaire Vitorino ont bien montré la complexité du sujet et les interrogations qui persistent. A mon avis, le travail n'est donc pas fini et ce n'est qu'après un examen approfondi de ces questions que nous pourrions nous prononcer sur l'adhésion à la Convention qui n'est pas faite, je le répète, pour les juristes mais pour les citoyens. <BRK>

Rack (PE). - Herr Präsident! Fast alles, was zum wichtigen Thema europäische Grundrechte zu sagen ist, hat Kommissar Vitorino bereits gesagt, nachzulesen auch im ausgezeichneten Schlussdokument. Er hat sich in Form und Inhalt als ein würdiger Nachfolger von Roman Herzog erwiesen. Der verdiente Applaus im Haus hat gezeigt, dass auch in unserem Konvent schon jetzt insgesamt Konsens besteht, die Charta telle quelle als verbindlichen Teil unserer künftigen Verfassung zu verlangen. Ich möchte in diesem Zusammenhang anmerken, dass die Variante A jedenfalls für die Mitglieder der Arbeitsgruppe die eindeutig optimale war und alles andere nur second best-Lösungen sein können.

Ein zweiter, aus unserer Sicht wichtiger Punkt ist das harmonische Miteinander der beiden Gerichtshöfe in Straßburg und Luxemburg und das, was Kollege Haenel gerade jetzt angesprochen hat, werden wir dabei berücksichtigen müssen. Ein paar wenige zusätzliche Bemerkungen erscheinen mir angebracht. Zunächst eine positive: Erstmals hat der Grundrechtechartatext eine starke Unterstützung auch durch die Vertreter der Beitrittsländer gefunden. Seinerzeit hat es nur eine Anhörung in unserer Arbeitsgruppe gegeben, und auch jetzt, in allen Wortmeldungen hier im Konvent, hat es einen ausdrücklichen Konsens gegeben, und ich glaube, das ist wichtig und gut so.

Eine kritische Anmerkung zur Arbeit der Arbeitsgruppe: In vielem hat sich bei einigen von unseren Kollegen gezeigt, dass sie die Funktion als Regierungsvertreter vielleicht ein wenig missverstehen. Selbst wenn und wo jemand Regierungsvertreter ist, kann er in diesem Konvent keine Vetomöglichkeit haben, und er soll sie auch nicht nutzen, um taktische Vorteile zu verlangen. Ich bin sehr froh, dass Minister Hain jetzt wenigstens der vollen Verbindlicherklärung zugestimmt hat. Ich sage nochmals Variante I oder Variante A ist die bessere, und die Artikel 52, Absatz 4 und 5 wären eigentlich auch entbehrlich.

Eine Schlussbemerkung: Wir werden die Zugänglichkeit zu den Gerichten in Luxemburg verbessern müssen. Artikel 203 Absatz 4 ist zu wenig. Hier brauchen wir mehr. <BRK>

Oleksy (Parl.-PL). - Mr President, we agree that the question of the incorporation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights, and the accession by the European Union to the European Convention on Human Rights is not a technical one. It should be perceived as a key element of the constitutional process of the Union. It concerns the philosophy of the Union seen as a Community of values.

I strongly welcome the remarkable work carried out by the working group, chaired by Commissioner Vitorino. This report is undoubtedly a well-balanced document. I am in favour of the incorporation of the Charter into the future single Constitutional Treaty in a form that would make the Charter legally binding.

The incorporation of the Charter will bring the Union closer to its citizens and allow them to better identify with the goals of the Union. I also support the working group recommendation to enable the Union to accede to the European Convention on Human Rights. It will make the European Human Rights protection system more credible and coherent. The level on which Union's citizens' fundamental rights are protected cannot be lower than the system of protection guaranteed by the European Convention on Human Rights.

Similarly, the proposal to amend Article 52 of the Charter is a step in the right direction, as it takes into account the constitutional traditions of the Member States. It is especially worth mentioning that the incorporation of the Charter, and the possible accession by the EU to the European Convention on Human Rights, does not modify the current division of competencies between the Union and the Member States, and will not lead to the extension of the Union's competencies.

I also agree with the need to refrain from any further discussion regarding the contents of the Charter as agreed by the previous Convention. Certain technical adjustments will however have to be made.

Finally, let me stress how important it is for Poland, as Mr Meyer also stressed, that the fundamental rights of the Union, of which it will soon be a member, be guaranteed and protected in a coherent and effective manner. <BRK>

Kirkhope (PE). - Mr President, there is no doubt, that this Charter is a significant document. But as a member of the previous Convention, I had concerns then, as I still have now, both in terms of its content, and the use to which it may be put, that is the legal status it might find itself in.

I was particularly concerned about some of the contents regarding the continuing powers of national governments and national parliaments in employment and social areas, for instance. I worry that some people here are talking as if it were the easiest thing in the world to incorporate this document. I think the British government owes us an explanation. I know we have already had one this morning from their minister. But, it is far from clear whether they are now saying that they agree that legal status should be given to this within a Treaty. This is completely unclear, and I would like to know their position.

Personally, I feel that this is a significant and important document. Parts of it, in particular those relating to specific human rights already covered by the European Convention, should be confirmed. All Member States, and Accession States have signed the Convention, and therefore we are entering into negotiation areas of considerable complexity. In order to get the support of the people of Europe, the ultimate Treaty we are looking for needs to be as straightforward as possible.

My final point, is as follows: it is important that the individual citizens of Europe have the ability to deal with their complaints, in a more hands-on way, whether it be through the Court of Justice, or the Court of Human Rights. The Court of Human Rights cannot deal with this, as they are Council of Europe based. But the Court of Justice, if it is to have further capacities, must allow for the establishment of a proper Ombudsman in Europe, who would have the powers, and ability to deal with the direct complaints of the citizens of Europe. <BRK>

Serracino-Inglott (Gouv.-MT). - Mr. President, I would simply like to suggest the addition of some vision for the future formulation of the Constitution Treaty, which I must say, is a brilliant intellectual tour de force achieved by Mr Vitorino's working group.

I suggest that in the article in the Treaty referring to the Nice codification, that Europe explicitly commits itself to an on-going process, aimed at going well beyond what is now being agreed. I support this option as being the most acceptable form for the same reasons as previously stated by Mr Meyer. In fact, at this point, due to a paradox in the Nice text, we really cannot improve on what the group is proposing.

On the one hand, the Nice text provides the most extensive coverage of human rights, especially in the field of socio-economics. On the other hand, it often expresses this in terms that are not practically enforceable by any court. It would be an obvious folly to try to sort out this paradox at this time.

I would like to ask, at this point of the constitution-making process, whether Europe should only commit itself to going beyond Mr Vitorino proposals at some later date? Surely, European citizens are entitled to all of the rights recognised by the European constitutions, including socio-economic rights, which are not protected in Strasbourg. These rights should not only be guaranteed vis-à-vis the European institutions, or national states implementing European law, but in general. This would of course, depend on the overly generic phraseology currently used in the Nice text being revised in due course. <BRK>

Brejc (Parl.-SI). - Mr President, Mr Vitorino and his group have prepared an excellent report. In part B, the members of the working group either strongly support, or are ready to give favourable consideration to a constitutional authorisation, enabling the European Union to accede to the European Charter on Human Rights. I am not a member of this group, yet I strongly support this suggestion. I would like to mention some political and legal arguments in favour of accession.

Accession would strengthen the protection of European citizens who are presently denied the right to bring complaints against the EU institutions before the Strasbourg Court. It would avoid the situation where there are alternative, competing and conflicting human rights protection systems, within the European Union and in Europe in general. Dual protection systems would weaken the overall protection offered and undermine legal certainty in the field of human rights in Europe.

For the new Member States, it should be very important, at least at a symbolic level, to see the Charter as part of the Constitutional Treaty. Mr President, I hope the Convention will support the idea of accession to the European Charter on Human Rights<BRK>

Fini (Ch.E/G.-IT). - Signor Presidente, innanzitutto ringrazio anch'io il Commissario Vitorino per le conclusioni del suo gruppo di lavoro. Sappiamo che non era facile raggiungere un consenso su una soluzione che rafforzasse la Carta come building block centrale nel sistema delle regole europee, senza però alterare il riparto di competenze tra l'Unione e gli Stati membri.

Mi sembra che sia stata molto opportuna la precisazione degli articoli 51 e 52 rafforzati, secondo cui il campo di applicazione della Carta è quello relativo al diritto e alle competenze dell'Unione. Credo che in questo modo possano, per il futuro, evitarsi delle contraddizioni tra le disposizioni della Carta e le legislazioni nazionali degli Stati membri.

Per quello che riguarda le modalità dell'incorporazione, il gruppo di lavoro ci indica due strade: o l'incorporazione della Carta nel preambolo o in un titolo del nuovo Trattato, oppure l'inserimento di un riferimento alla Carta in un articolo. Mi sembra che questa scelta non vada drammatizzata e che si possa ragionare in termini di opportunità.

La prima opzione presenterebbe, a mio giudizio, delle questioni e dei problemi tecnici. Basti pensare al fatto che inserire nel Trattato costituzionale 54 articoli - tanti ne contiene la Carta - determinerebbe certamente un notevole appesantimento del nostro lavoro. In secondo luogo, mi sembra difficile contestare che inserire 54 articoli significherebbe, per forza di cose, modificare o abrogare quegli articoli della Carta o del Trattato che in qualche modo sanciscono gli stessi principi.

E' questa la ragione per la quale la mia preferenza va alla seconda opzione, cioè all'integrazione, attraverso un riferimento in un articolo del Trattato, proprio perché questo comporterebbe, tra l'altro, la possibilità di non modificare il testo della Carta, così come ha auspicato il gruppo di lavoro.

Questa è la ragione, in sintesi, per cui il governo italiano ritiene preferibile all'incorporazione testuale quella opzione che il gruppo di lavoro definisce come riferimento appropriato. <BRK>

Van Lancker (PE). - Voorzitter, graag vijf puntjes. Eerste punt, ik zou graag de werkgroep en de heer Vitorino feliciteren voor de consensus die ze gevonden hebben om het Handvest op te nemen in de grondwet en de toetreding tot het Europees Verdrag voor de rechten van de mens mogelijk te maken. Eerlijk gezegd zou ik het ongelooflijk vinden als we erin zouden slagen een grondwet te maken zonder te verwijzen naar de grondrechten. Persoonlijk vind ik, zoals de meerderheid van de werkgroep en de meerderheid van de collega's die zich hier hebben uitgesproken, dat het Handvest het best integraal in de grondwet opgenomen kan worden en niet in een bijlage of in een protocol. Ik begrijp eigenlijk niet goed de bezwaren van Peter Hain, die als voorwaarde stelt dat de Britse regering akkoord moet gaan. Het zou qua juridische afdwingbaarheid geen verschil maken, maar qua zichtbaarheid des te meer.

Ten tweede, een grondwet heeft een preambule nodig die de waarden expliciteert. De preambule van het Handvest doet dat en ik zou echt willen aanbevelen om die preambule dan ook op te nemen in de ontwerpgrondwet die wij gaan maken. Ik wou trouwens ook de voorzitter danken voor het feit dat hij nu al gezien heeft dat we dan consequent moeten zijn en ook artikel 2 van het ontwerp dat we gisteren gekregen hebben, moeten aanvullen met de notie solidariteit.

Ten derde, ik vind het juist dat het Handvest de bevoegdheden van de Unie niet impliciet moet uitbreiden. Maar het moet wel een dynamisch document blijven, dus moeten we vermijden dat horizontale artikelen het Handvest gaan betonnen. Ik heb één groot probleem met de technische aanpassing van namelijk artikel 52, paragraaf 5 maar op een ander punt dat collega Duhamel. Rechten en principes van het Handvest moeten de toetssteen zijn voor alle optreden, niet alleen daar waar de Unie de principes implementeert, maar in alle handelingen van de Unie en de lidstaten in het kader van het recht van de Unie. Ik denk dat de tekst die nu in zin 2 staat daar haaks op staat en de beperking van het Handvest op zich inhoudt.

Tot slot, voorzitter, het Handvest heeft de grote verdienste dat het rechten formuleert die niet alleen gelden voor de burgers die de nationaliteit hebben van de lidstaten, maar voor alle mensen die duurzaam verblijf hebben in de Unie. Ik denk dat wij daar ook onze conclusies moeten uit trekken en de moed hebben om in artikel 5 van het ontwerp dat u ons gisteren overhandigd hebt, het burgerschap te definiëren op basis van residentie, van verblijf, van bijdrage tot de samenleving en niet uitsluitend op het bekrompen concept van nationaliteit of lidmaatschap van een van de lidstaten. <BRK>

Cisneros Laborda (Parl.-ES). - Señor Presidente, estoy seguro de atenerme a los términos de "jibarización" de la palabra que nos ha indicado.

Yo querría unirme al coro de felicitaciones de que ha sido objeto nuestro Presidente, el Comisario Sr. Vitorino, por su excelente labor en el seno del Grupo de trabajo y por el excelente fruto representado por el documento que nos aporta. Él ha sido un auténtico constructor de consensos. Éste es un texto que básicamente goza de un amplísimo consenso, pero no es un consenso de mínimos -no se ha obtenido a base de limitar o reducir las posiciones extremas-, ni tampoco es un consenso apócrifo -no se ha obtenido a base de alcanzar un acuerdo sobre las palabras a costa de atribuirles significados ambiguos a sus contenidos-, sino que se ha obtenido profundizando en la materia objeto de examen; el Comisario Vitorino ha hecho un auténtico ejercicio de persuasión, de suerte que hemos alcanzado un documento del más alto nivel técnico, susceptible de incorporarse al Tratado Constitucional o de suministrar los criterios para hacerlo, que atribuye a los derechos y a las libertades fundamentales el papel nuclear que deben tener.

Se ha invocado por parte de algunos compañeros predecesores en el uso de la palabra su condición de intervinientes en la anterior Convención, en la Convención redactora de la Carta, para denunciar un supuesto carácter regresivo que podría tener la nueva redacción de las cláusulas horizontales o también el valor interpretativo que se atribuye a las explicaciones. Debo decir que no coincido en absoluto con ese diagnóstico. Creo, por el contrario, que hay que invocar la suerte corrida por la Carta de los Derechos Fundamentales, relegada a una mera declaración institucional solemne. Es decir, creo que una consideración de eficacia debería ser muy tenida en cuenta para respaldar el contenido de esas cláusulas horizontales.

Francamente, yo optaría -digo optaría en términos condicionales porque, después de algunas posiciones por parte del Sr. Representante del Gobierno británico que hemos oído aquí, debo quedarme en esos términos condicionales-, yo optaría por la solución A, es decir, por la inclusión de los cuarenta y tantos artículos de la Carta, tal cual están, en lo que sería la parte dogmática de la Constitución. Veo que la arquitectura del Tratado, con su referencia en el artículo 6, ya claramente insinúa o sugiere otra solución, bien sea la remisión, bien sea el protocolo. Es claro que, desde el punto de vista de su carácter vinculante, estas otras fórmulas no afectan ni disminuyen en nada dicho carácter, pero, desde un punto de vista pedagógico, desde un punto de vista de visibilidad, de comprensión, de divulgación de los valores fundamentales de la Carta y de la Constitución entre los ciudadanos, yo creo que estas otras fórmulas son menos deseables. Al final, no vamos a hacer un Tratado que quepa en el bolsillo o que se pueda estudiar en los institutos de enseñanza media y, si lo hacemos, desde luego, no van a tener en él los derechos ni las libertades fundamentales el papel que hubiéramos querido.

Respecto a la adhesión al Convenio -y termino-, no tenemos que decidirlo, ni en el Grupo de trabajo ni en el Pleno. Basta con la habilitación que supone la atribución de la personalidad jurídica, pero yo comparto las reservas manifestadas por el Sr. Haenel. <BRK>

Paciotti (PE). - Signor Presidente, mi limito ad esprimere il mio dissenso su un solo punto delle proposte dell'eccellente relazione del Commissario Vitorino, che per il resto condivido. Si tratta della proposta di aggiungere tre nuove clausole alla Carta dei diritti. Nonostante la benevola interpretazione che ne dà il Commissario Vitorino, l'aggiunta di tre nuove clausole mette in discussione, a mio giudizio, il compromesso raggiunto nella prima Convenzione e crea incertezza giuridica.

L'articolo 51 della Carta dice che le Istituzioni e gli organi dell'Unione rispettano i diritti, osservano i principi, ne promuovono l'applicazione, shall observe the principles, promote the application. Si vuole aggiungere una clausola che dice che le disposizioni che contengono i principi possono essere attuate da atti legislativi o esecutivi, may be implemented. Questa clausola crea ambiguità e incertezza: o è inutile ovvero è dannosa, e, data l'insistenza per ottenerla, dubito che si voglia una cosa inutile.

Altre norme della Carta prevedono che i diritti spettino secondo le norme del diritto comunitario, le legislazioni e le prassi degli Stati membri. Ora si chiede di tener conto soltanto delle legislazioni e delle pratiche nazionali. Insomma, le tre clausole danno un messaggio politico di minimizzazione della Carta dei diritti, l'esatto contrario di quello che ci chiede la società civile, che vorrebbe vedere la Carta potenziata. <BRK>

Svensson (Parl.-SE). - Herr ordförande! Jag vill inleda med att tacka herr Vitorino för hans utmärkta insats som ordförande i vår arbetsgrupp. Resultatet har blivit mycket bra. Förslagen om EU:s anslutning till Europakonventionen om skydd för de mänskliga rättigheterna samt införlivande av EU-stadgan i fördraget måste ses som kompletterande lösningar på EU:s skydd av mänskliga rättigheter. För mig är det viktigt att konstatera följande: att göra stadgan juridiskt bindande förutsätter för min del en anslutning till Europakonventionen.

Sverige har i sin grundlag ett fri- och rättighetskapitel och har dessutom införlivat Europakonventionen. Det är således naturligt att ha ett rättighetskydd i ett konstitutionellt fördrag, samtidigt som EU ansluter sig till Europakonventionen. Mot denna bakgrund finner jag det mycket glädjande att en helt enig arbetsgrupp ställer sig positiv till en anslutning av EU till Europakonventionen. En av de främsta vinsterna med en sådan anslutning är att vi åstadkommer ett närmande mellan EU-stater och stater utanför EU och därmed förstärker skyddet för de grundläggande rättigheterna i hela Europa.

Att EU har underkastat sig den externa granskningen ökar vår trovärdighet, inte minst på den internationella arenan. I slutrapporten noteras att det i fördragen skall ges ett konstitutionellt bemyndigande som ger unionen möjlighet att ansluta sig till Europakonventionen. Jag noterade att detta inte fanns omnämnt i utkastet till konstitutionellt fördrag, men det bör göras. Jag föreslår dessutom att det i samband med antagandet av ett nytt konstitutionellt fördrag borde göras en politisk deklaration om anslutningen till Europakonventionen. Anslutningen har många fördelar. Jag kan inte nämna alla, men jag måste nämna den klara och positiva signal som vi sänder ut till medborgarna om att unionen tar mänskliga rättigheter på allvar. Samma signal sänder vi ut genom att införliva EU-stadgan i fördraget och göra den rättsligt bindande.

Arbetsgruppen har haft en gemensam strävan och har också lyckats finna lösningar på de tekniska problemen som är förknippade med att göra stadgan rättsligt bindande. Enligt min uppfattning är det bästa sättet att tydliggöra rättigheterna för EU-medborgarna att föra in stadgan i dess helhet i fördraget. Den kan då utgöra en naturlig del i ett nytt grundfördrag för EU. <BRK>

Muscardini (PE). - Signor Presidente, mi dolgo che il tempo sia più tiranno con alcuni rispetto ad altri: farò pervenire il mio intervento per iscritto. Rimarco comunque la necessità che la politica torni a riconquistare quegli spazi che in questi anni ha lasciato scoperti. Non ci sembra utopia ritenere che la politica non debba essere solo ragion di Stato ma anche strumento etico per avvicinare i cittadini e costruire una società europea, nella quale la libertà, principio ispiratore degli Stati moderni, intesa come libertà sia individuale che associativa, sia anche la libertà e la capacità di affrontare le sfide future tenendo conto delle diversità che esistono tra gli individui come tra gli Stati, e sia perciò una libertà garantita da regole che, difendendo la democrazia, impediscano la nascita di oligarchie e sappiano coniugare i diritti e i doveri sia dei singoli che degli Stati. E' per questo che riteniamo che la Carta ampliata - non è infatti sufficiente così com'è - e resa contenuto vivo per le esigenze della società, dovrebbe rimanere un testo autonomo, mentre il nuovo Trattato, in uno specifico articolo, dovrebbe enunciare valori e principi comuni per gli Stati membri facendo alla Carta specifico riferimento. <BRK>

Moscovici (Ch.E/G.-FR). - Monsieur le Président, je formulerais cinq remarques en style télégraphique après avoir félicité Monsieur Vitorino et le groupe de travail.

Premièrement, je me réjouis que le groupe se soit prononcé unanimement en faveur de l'intégration de la Charte dans le Traité et ensuite, pour dire que l'option consistant à l'incorporer dans les tout premiers chapitres de notre future Constitution semble cohérente avec la nature même de la Charte et cela lui donnerait une visibilité maximale.

Deuxièmement, je souscris aussi tout à fait au sage principe retenu par le groupe selon lequel il ne faut pas chercher à renégocier le contenu de la Charte, y compris son préambule. Ce n'est pas contradictoire bien sûr avec la vocation de la Charte à être enrichie à l'avenir du nouveau droit.

Troisièmement, ce principe même me conduit cependant à m'interroger sur l'opportunité des modifications proposées aux articles horizontaux de la Charte et, en toute hypothèse, le nouveau paragraphe 5 de l'article 52 ne me semble pas acceptable car il tend à limiter fortement la portée juridique de ce que la Charte appelle les principes.

Quatrièmement, s'agissant de l'adhésion éventuelle de l'Union à la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme, chacun sait que la France y est jusqu'à présent toujours opposée. Toutefois, nous partageons tout à fait l'objectif d'améliorer encore davantage la protection juridictionnelle des citoyens. Mais il convient de bien réfléchir afin de savoir si une adhésion à la Convention est le meilleur moyen d'y parvenir.

Dernière observation, il me semble que l'extension des possibilité de recours des particuliers devant les juridictions communautaires constituerait une réelle amélioration de la protection des droits des citoyens. Il faudra y réfléchir tout comme il faudra peut-être réfléchir aux moyens qu'il faudrait donner pour y parvenir, à la Cour de justice et au Tribunal de première instance. <BRK>

Hjelm-Wallén (Ch.E/G.-SE). - Herr ordförande, kära kolleger! Jag vill börja med att berömma arbetsgruppen för förslaget att EU skall ansluta sig Europakonventionen om skydd för de mänskliga rättigheterna. Arbetsgruppen har på ett utmärkt sätt behandlat denna fråga, och det gläder mig att gruppen står så enig bakom rekommendationen.

Det är en trovärdighetsfråga för unionen att vi tar de mänskliga rättigheterna på allvar, inte bara i högtidstal utan även när vi fattar politiska beslut. Europakonventionen är ett väl etablerat juridiskt dokument med en utvecklad praxis som garanterar en hög grad av rättssäkerhet. Genom att ansluta sig till konventionen stärker EU väsentligt det breda alleuropeiska samarbetet kring mänskliga rättigheter. Som arbetsgruppen själv konstaterar, är det också av stor vikt att medborgarna tillförsäkras samma grad av skydd för mänskliga rättigheter gentemot Europeiska unionen som de har gentemot sina respektive länder.

Vad gäller stadgan om grundläggande rättigheter har den svenska regeringen, liksom i stort sett hela den svenska riksdagen, uttalat att införlivandet av stadgan förutsätter att förhållandet till Europakonventionen regleras på ett tillfredsställande sätt. Skälet till detta har för oss varit att det inte får finnas oklarheter och olika praxis mellan Europadomstolen och EG-domstolen; det är naturligtvis inte för att vi ifrågasätter innehållet i stadgan. Vi är nu glada för att stadgan kommer att kunna införlivas i fördraget. Min sista kommentar är dock att ju mer framträdande plats stadgan får i fördraget, desto viktigare är det att de horisontella artiklarna är så heltäckande som möjligt.

Arbetsgruppen har i sin rapport visat på flera möjligheter att införliva stadgan i fördraget och lämnar förslag om hur de horisontella artiklarna kan förtydligas ytterligare. Jag menar att det är viktigt att det arbetet fortsätter, och jag utgår från att presidiet nu arbetar vidare med frågan i syfte att finna en bred lösning som hela konventet kan ställa sig bakom. <BRK>

Petersen (Parl.-DA). - Mr President, I would firstly like to align myself with the words of praise for the work of Commissioner Vitorino.

The European Union makes legislation and decisions on matters of vital importance for its citizens and businesses. It is therefore crucial that the EU respects fundamental rights when it acts.

The Charter on Fundamental Rights, which has been drafted in a political context, is an important statement. I fully believe that now is the time to make the Charter legally binding. To make a political text legally binding is a major step, and we must not pull the wool over the eyes of our citizens, by making them believe that all the provisions in the Charter can be invoked in the European or national courts.

I therefore favour that we make the Charter legally binding by introducing a reference in the Treaty, stating that the EU respects the Charter on Fundamental Rights as general principles in EU law. We all know that model already. It is the same model that was used when we made the European Convention on Human Rights legally binding in the EU.

The European Court of Justice has taken the responsibility of ensuring that the EU complies with human rights, including the European Convention on Human Rights. And it has done this very well.

For the reasons I have just mentioned, I welcome the Working Group's proposal to add to the Charter some "horizontal provisions". Making the Charter legally binding will indeed, Mr President, be a big step forward for the protection of the citizens' legal position within the EU. <BRK>

Hain (Ch.E/G.-GB). - Mr President, could I say to my comrades Olivier Duhamel and Anne Van Lancker that it is very important to recognise that we have here at least four governments: the U.K., Italy, Spain and Ireland, who have spoken in the same terms. They all want to see the legal accession of the Charter.

But, we have to have the second option, and we need legal certainty. I would also point out, that inserting it straight into the Treaty would mean that the Charter would in fact be longer than the Draft Constitution. The Charter has 54 articles, while the Draft Constitution only has 46. You need to ask yourselves some serious questions here.

For the first time, we can see way forward. Let us move together on this agenda, and let us find a result we can all be united on. I know the Convention does not want to be bored by internal political squabbling from Britain, but the Conservatives, in my view, have consistently been an anti-European party, and I am standing with the Convention in building a consensus. <BRK>

Mielestäni se lisäisi EU:n uskottavuutta kansalaisten silmissä. Lisäykset horisontaalisiin artikloihin ovat mielestäni osin turhia, mutta jos ne auttavat eräitä hallituksia myönteiseen ratkaisuun, olkoot olemassa. Sen sijaan olin pettynyt siihen, että eilen jaetussa luonnoksessa ei ollut sellaista artiklaa, joka sallisi EU:n liittymisen Euroopan ihmisoikeussopimukseen. Sellainen sinne tulisi mielestäni ehdottomasti lisätä.

De Vries (Regering - NL). - Voorzitter, Nederland deelt de wens van deze Conventie en de werkgroep om de waarborgen van grondrechten van de Europese burger een plaats te geven in het Verdrag. Het was immers de Unie die in Maastricht en Amsterdam heeft uitgesproken dat respect voor de mensenrechten de grondslag vormt voor de identiteit van de Unie en een belangrijk onderdeel van ons extern beleid. Daar moeten wij voorzien in de lacune dat er geen rechtsbescherming is van de burger tegen handelingen van de instellingen van de Unie zelf.

De materiële bepalingen van het Handvest staan hier niet ter discussie. Maar toch zijn er wel enkele bepalingen die nauwkeuriger geformuleerd zouden moeten worden omdat ze, als ze juridisch bindend zouden zijn, wellicht te ruime rechten zouden toekennen. Ik denk daarbij aan het recht op kosteloos onderwijs.

De Nederlandse regering heeft daarom een voorkeur voor verwijzing naar het Handvest in artikel 6, lid 2 van het Verdrag, zodat het Handvest een bron van interpretatie kan zijn voor het Hof van Justitie. Ik merk op dat ook Peter Hain en Gianfranco Fini zich zojuist in vergelijkbare zin hebben uitgelaten.

De voorgestelde aanpassingen van de horizontale bepalingen zijn een belangrijke vooruitgang. Ik pleit ervoor dat we duidelijkheid scheppen tussen de beginselen van het Handvest en de bepalingen die stammen uit de constitutionele tradities die een lidstaat gemeen hebben. Door een dergelijk onderscheid is glashelder aan te geven welke beginselen nieuw zijn en welke voortkomen uit de reeds bestaande tradities van de lidstaten. Dat zou het Handvest kunnen vereenvoudigen.

Tenslotte, voorzitter, kan ik u melden dat het Nederlandse parlement een motie heeft aangenomen die uitspreekt dat wij vóór toetreding van de Unie tot het EVRM zijn, maar er zal nog wel een oplossing gevonden moeten worden voor de mogelijke conflicterende rechtsgangen in Luxemburg en Straatsburg. <BRK>

Christophersen (Ch.E/G.-DK). -Mr. President, I would like firstly to thank the working group and Mr Vitorino, for a very well-drafted and comprehensive report, concerning the incorporation of the Charter, and the accession to the European Convention on Human Rights. The report is an excellent basis for the discussion in the Convention, on whether and how the Charter can be made legally binding, as foreseen in the Laeken declaration. The Chairman of the working group and the members have shown a remarkable willingness to create the necessary basis for reaching consensus.

From my point of view, we are in favour of making the Charter legally binding in order to emphasise that the European Union is a community of nations which attaches great importance to the protection of its citizens. We would prefer the incorporation of the Charter into the Constitution Treaty following the so-called indirect reference model. For example, it is stated in the Treaty that the Union respects the Charter on Fundamental Rights as outlined in EU law. This model corresponds with the approach in the existing Union Treaty, (Article 6, paragraph 2), by which the European Convention on Human Rights has become legally binding as a general principle in EU law.

Let me add, Mr President, that I fully agree with the working group when it stresses the importance of explaining the Charter. The explanations of the new horizontal positions should be incorporated into the existing ones. This would create clarity, and safeguard the rule of law. We believe it important that the Convention decides whether these explanations should have judicial value at a later stage.

Finally, I welcome the proposal of introducing a Constitutional authorisation enabling the Union to accede to the European Charter of Human Rights into the new Treaty. The accession of the Union will imply that the EU institutions will be under the same external jurisdiction of the Court of European Human Rights as the Member States and candidate countries. <BRK>

Maij-Weggen (PE). - Voorzitter, veel dank aan de heer Vitorino voor het uitstekende werk dat is geleverd. Drie punten, kort, omwille van de tijd.

In de eerste plaats een compliment voor de wijze waarop de aanvankelijke controverse tussen het EVRM en het Handvest is opgelost. Dank ook aan de rechters en deskundigen van de Europese hoven die daar hele constructieve artikelen over hebben geschreven en handreikingen hebben gedaan. Ook dank voor het feit dat uit de kring van de Raad van Europa - ik denk aan de heer Van der Linden - handreikingen zijn gedaan om EVRM en Handvest met elkaar in overeenstemming te brengen.

Tweede punt, ik heb twijfel over het idee om nog wijzigingen aan te brengen in het Handvest. Als het gaat om technische wijzigingen, vind ik dat geen probleem, maar ik denk dat we inhoudelijk niets meer moeten veranderen. Ik ben het op dat punt eens met de heer Duhamel en mevrouw Paciotti.

Ten slotte, ik ben blij dat het stuk opgenomen kan worden in het constitutioneel gedeelte van het Verdrag. Er is dan de discussie over de vraag of dat direct of via een verwijzing moet gebeuren. Voor mij is doorslaggevend wat de juridische achtergrond daarvan is: als het zwakker is om het met een verwijzing te doen, ben ik daar tegen, als het geen verschil uitmaakt, dan wil ik daar niet dogmatisch over zijn. <BRK>

Bruton (Parl.-IE). - Mr President, I congratulate Antonio.

Once the Union had moved into the area of Justice and Home Affairs, the incorporation of fundamental rights into the Treaty became essential. But there is no room for ambiguity in a Charter for which people will have to vote in a referendum, where the "yes" advocates would not only face persuasive but destructive questions. Some questions now require answers.

Against whom are the rights in the Charter to be enforced? If the Charter does not extend the scope of application of Union law beyond the powers of the Union, against whom, and how, are the rights outside the scope of Union law in the Charter to be enforced?

Obviously the articles on marriage, academic freedom, education, free placement services, and social security cannot be enforced against a Union which is confined to spend 1.2% of GDP, and which is bound by subsidiarity. Article 51 of the Charter is actually ambiguous. It says that "due regard to the principle of subsidiarity". What does "due regard" mean? It all depends on who is doing the "regarding".

Paragraph 6 of the report stresses the distinction between rights and principles. These rights, I presume, are the only rights enforceable in court. But there is no list in existence of which articles are "rights" and which articles are "principles".

To sum up, if this is to pass in a referendum, we must be able to answer questions about what we are actually promising. I remind colleagues of the words of La Rochefoucauld: "We promise according to our hopes, we perform according to our fears." <BRK>

Μαύρου (Parl.-CY). – Κύριε Πρόεδρε, μετά από 35 ομιλητές δεν μένουν πολλά να πεις μέσα σε ένα λεπτό. Θα αναφερθώ σε τρία σημεία μόνο.

Το ένα είναι ότι αναγνωρίζουμε πως το περιεχόμενο του Χάρτη δεν είναι σήμερα αντικείμενο συζήτησης. Γι' αυτό δεν στεκόμαστε σε επιφυλάξεις ή ακόμα σε διαφορετικές προσεγγίσεις που έχουν αρκετοί από εμάς σε ότι αφορά συγκεκριμένα άρθρα του Χάρτη. Είμαστε έτοιμοι να δούμε θετικά την ενσωμάτωσή του στο συνταγματικό πλαίσιο της Ένωσης και δεν θα σταθώ στην τεχνική της ενσωμάτωσης, από την στιγμή που διασφαλίζεται η δεσμευτικότητα του Χάρτη.

Το δεύτερο σημείο αφορά τα οριζόντια άρθρα, ιδιαίτερα το άρθρο 52. Συμμερίζομαι τις ανησυχίες που έχουν εκφρασθεί από τον κ. Duhamel, την κ. Kaufmann, αλλά και άλλους ομιλητές για την συμπερίληψη αυτών των νέων προνοιών. Έχω την εντύπωση ότι δημιουργούν αβεβαιότητα και σύγχυση που είναι δυνατόν να αναιρέσουν αρχές του Χάρτη.

Το τρίτο σημείο αφορά την προσχώρηση στην Ευρωπαϊκή Σύμβαση Ανθρωπίνων Δικαιωμάτων. Πιστεύω ότι είναι ανάγκη να δούμε πραγματικά με εποικοδομητική διάθεση τη θέσπιση μιας συνταγματικής εξουσιοδότησης που θα επιτρέπει στην Ένωση να προχωρήσει στην Ευρωπαϊκή Σύμβαση για πολλούς λόγους, που αναλύονται στην έκθεση, γιατί διασφαλίζει την προστασία των πολιτών έναντι της Ένωσης. <BRK>

Vitorino (CE). – Merci, Monsieur le Président. Je vais être très bref. Tout d'abord, je souhaiterais remercier les références personnelles que je tiens à partager avec tous les membres du groupe de travail. Ce groupe de travail n'est pas une exception. Sans volonté de compromis, la Convention n'aboutira pas à un résultat positif. C'est le principe que nous avons suivi dans notre travail. Il s'agit donc d'une solution de compromis. Et habituellement, les solutions de compromis sont orphelines à la fin si elles échouent tandis que si elles ont du succès, il y a une multiplication de parents. J'espère que ce sera un cas de multiplication des parrains du compromis.

En ce qui concerne les trois questions essentielles qui ont été soulevées par Monsieur Méndez de Vigo, je dois dire que ce qui est écrit là-bas, c'est que les droits de la Charte qui ne découlent ni d'autres articles des Traités ni de la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme et qui donc, n'ont comme source que la tradition constitutionnelle commune des Etats membres, doivent être interprétés en harmonie avec cette tradition constitutionnelle commune. Ce qui peut être d'une certaine façon considéré comme tautologique, c'est la répétition du savoir acquis sans doute, mais également la consécration dans la Charte de la jurisprudence de la Cour de justice. Celle-ci est claire, dans le sens où tradition constitutionnelle commune ne veut pas dire moindre dénominateur commun. Cela signifie interprétation des valeurs qui sont communes à tous les Etats membres mais qui n'ont pas la même portée dans chacune des Constitutions de ces Etats membres. Je crois que c'est dans cette ligne qu'il convient d'interpréter l'article 52.4.

La question de l'adhésion à la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme est un problème à la fois politique et juridique. Du point de vue politique, je vous rappelle que le Conseil européen de Copenhague a dit à tous les Etats candidats qu'ils devraient adhérer à la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme comme préalable à la garantie du plein respect des droits fondamentaux dans leur ordre juridique national afin de pouvoir adhérer à l'Union européenne. Il est un peu étrange que nous puissions nous permettre de demander aux pays candidats d'adhérer à la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme et que nous-mêmes ne soyons pas prêts d'en faire autant, pour nous soumettre à un contrôle extérieur de la conformité des statuts des droits fondamentaux dans le droit de l'Union vis-à-vis de la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme.

Je comprends l'observation de Monsieur Haenel car en effet, on ne peut pas conclure que l'adhésion conduirait de façon incontournable à un allègement des procédures judiciaires dans les Etats membres. En effet, aujourd'hui, il est déjà possible qu'un citoyen d'un Etat-membre, qui est l'objet d'une norme juridique d'un Etat-membre en application du droit communautaire puisse soulever auprès des tribunaux nationaux la question de la violation de la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme, y compris l'accès à Strasbourg. La seule différence est qu'aujourd'hui, l'auteur moral de la règle, à savoir l'organe ou l'Institution de l'Union, n'est pas là pour répondre de son activité. Celui qui est là est le pauvre Etat-membre qui ne peut qu'opposer cette réponse "que puis-je y faire ? Je ne fais qu'accomplir mes obligations dans le cadre de l'Union européenne". Je ne pense pas que ce soit une révolution mais plutôt, une petite réforme qui a quand même une valeur symbolique du point de vue politique.

Avant de parler des droits et les principes, je voudrais simplement dire à Peter Hain que je pense que l'on devrait ajouter les explications de nos débats de cette Convention aux explications du Praesidium de la précédente Convention. Dans ce cadre-là, je me propose de mener cette opération d'addition en consultation étroite avec les membres du groupe de travail et les soumettre à la fin, au Praesidium de cette Convention. Les explications n'ont pas une valeur juridique, on le sait, mais sont un élément important d'interprétation des textes de la Convention.

En ce qui concerne les remarques sur la question la plus controversée sans doute, à savoir l'article 52.5 et en d'autres termes, la distinction entre droits et principes, il convient d'être clairs. Je crois que la distinction entre droits et principes existe déjà dans la Charte. La question est de savoir si on bouleverse ou non cette distinction. Très franchement, je ne crois pas. Je pense que ce qu'on dit avec cet article 52.5, c'est qu'il est évident que les droits objectifs et les droits subjectifs sont des droits à des prestations. C'est une évidence. Les principes n'ont pas la même portée que les droits subjectifs. Les principes ne sont pas "self executing", ce qui signifie que les principes requièrent des actions explicites d'exécution pour devenir contraignants. Mais en plus, ce que nous faisons dans cet ajout, c'est clarifier que quand l'Union adopte des règles juridiques ou prend des actions pour appliquer les principes, elles doivent bien sûr respecter ces principes-là. Ces principes sont justiciables mais ils ne le sont pas directement. Ils le sont d'un point de vue normatif. C'est ce que le professeur Braibant appelait à la Convention précédente "justiciabilité normative". C'est l'explication de l'article 52.5 qui n'est pas en contradiction avec l'article 51.1. Pour certains, ça peut être une répétition. Je suis d'accord. Mais à l'école, j'ai appris une expression latine qui disait "quod abundat non nocet", que l'on peut traduire par ce qui est abondant n'est pas nuisible. Et selon moi, cet ajout n'est pas nuisible. Si vous voulez, on peut la discuter juridiquement. Je prends d'ailleurs beaucoup de plaisir à discuter juridiquement des choses. Toutefois, si on voit cette question politiquement, un peu plus au-delà de cette discussion qui fait le bonheur des juristes, on se rendra compte, selon moi, que du point de vue historique, cette discussion sur l'article 52.5 ne méritera même pas une note de fin de page dans l'histoire de la Charte des droits fondamentaux. Par contre, une vision trop pessimiste de l'interprétation d'un article de la Charte peut jeter la Charte dans une querelle dès son début, ce qui serait très nuisible à la fin, dans le cadre de son application. Je crois qu'aujourd'hui, on fait un grand pas en avant pour consacrer la Charte des droits fondamentaux dans le statut d'un texte constitutionnel et juridiquement contraignant au-delà des notes de fin de page. Personnellement, j'ai une grande confiance en la Charte afin de surmonter toute difficulté d'interprétation juridique.

Hänsch (PE). - Herr Präsident, Kolleginnen und Kollegen! Der Konvent hat das Präsidium aufgefordert, bis spätestens im Herbst dieses Jahres die Architektur für einen neuen Vertrag der Europäischen Union vorzulegen. Sie, Herr Präsident, haben das mit Unterstützung des Präsidiums getan. Die Architektur liegt vor. Das ist auch ein Erfolg des gesamten Konvents. Ich sage: Der Entwurf ist das Dokument eines mutigen Realismus. Natürlich wissen wir, da gibt es noch eine ganze Reihe blinder Stellen. Wir wissen auch, es ist noch Unausgegrenztes und Unakzeptables in diesem Entwurf, vor allem im Teil Institutionen. Darüber wird es noch intensive und sicherlich auch kontroverse Debatten hier in diesem Plenum geben.

Wir wissen, dass wir einen noch schwierigen Weg vor uns haben. Wir werden noch vielen Schlaglöchern und Stolpersteinen ausweichen müssen. Wir werden aufpassen müssen, dass wir nicht in eine Regouvernementalisierung der Europäischen Union hineingleiten, aber mit dem gestern vorgelegten Verfassungsentwurf wissen wir, dass da ein Weg ist, den wir gemeinsam gehen können. Die Architektur lässt die tragenden Strukturen der künftigen Europäischen Union deutlich erkennen, jedenfalls die wichtigen unter ihnen.

Erstens, wir werden den Entwurf einer Verfassung für die Europäische Union ausarbeiten. Vor acht Monaten war das durchaus noch eine sehr umstrittene Frage. Dass wir uns darauf geeinigt haben, ist ein Erfolg der Arbeit, die wir in den vergangenen acht Monaten gemacht haben. Zweitens, wir werden einen einheitlichen Vertrag haben, und ich unterstreiche nur einen einheitlichen Vertrag mit einem Verfassungsteil und einem operativen Teil. Das ist ein klares Bekenntnis zur Rechtssicherheit und zur Kontinuität. Vor acht Monaten lag das alles noch in weiter Ferne.

Wir werden die Grundrechtscharta in die Verfassung aufnehmen und verbindlich machen. Jeder weiß - und wir haben das ja gerade noch einmal in der Diskussion bemerkt -, welche rechtlichen und politisch-kulturellen Probleme damit aufgeworfen sind, aber wir zeigen auch, dass wir über Nizza ein großes Stück hinausgehen werden.

Viertens, wir werden der Union die Rechtspersönlichkeit zuerkennen. Das wird ihr erlauben, nach außen einheitlich vertreten zu sein und geschlossen aufzutreten. Vor acht Monaten war das noch außerhalb jeden Konsenses. Dass wir das geschafft haben, ist auch ein Erfolg der bisherigen Arbeit.

Fünftens, wir lösen die unsinnige und hinderliche Pfeilerstruktur der heutigen Verträge auf. Damit wird eine Forderung des Europäischen Parlaments, die wir seit Maastricht und Amsterdam immer wieder erhoben haben, erfüllt. Sechstens, wir nähern uns mit dem Entwurf dem Ziel einen großen Schritt, nämlich der Union eine neue, straffere, einfachere und transparentere Grundlage zu geben. Das ist der Auftrag von Laeken, den wir zu erfüllen haben. Gewiss, noch ist nichts gewonnen. Nichts ist festgezurr, nichts zementiert, aber die Architektur für das neue Haus ist konzipiert. Jetzt muss sich der Konvent auf die Baustelle begeben. Aus der Form, die dieser Entwurf für die neue Union vorsieht, kann sie weltpolitisches Format gewinnen und die Kraft für eine Politik zum gemeinsamen Wohl der Völker Europas. Das Notwendige möglich zu machen, diesem Auftrag haben wir uns mit dem Entwurf für die Architektur einer neuen Verfassung ein großes Stück genähert. <BRK>

Palacio Valleresundi (Ch.E/G.-ES). - Señor Presidente, en aras de la brevedad, puedo decir que suscribo lo que acaba de decir Klaus Hänsch, que creo que, con brío, ha descrito perfectamente cuáles son los principales puntos de esta importante etapa que estamos a punto de iniciar.

En efecto, la Convención vuelve a demostrar que cumple. Hemos terminado la fase de escucha y hemos puesto sobre la mesa un esqueleto de Tratado Constitucional. Y la Convención, además, ya tiene resultados: el primero, señor Presidente, se le debe en gran medida a usted, y es que la palabra Convención, la idea de que Europa tenga una Convención, ya ha pasado a ser razonable y confortablemente asumida por las opiniones públicas.

Pero hoy damos un paso más. Con este esqueleto de Constitución sobre la mesa de la Convención, los ciudadanos europeos ya no van a asociar Europa a un mercado, van a asociar Europa a esa Constitución, que ven cómo llega.

Tres observaciones sobre el contenido, suscribiendo lo que ha dicho Klaus Hänsch. Sobre la estructura: me parece importante que tengamos sólo un Tratado y que simplifiquemos, y me parece importante que ese Tratado tenga dos partes, porque la parte de las políticas tiene naturaleza constitucional; Europa no es un Estado, Europa no puede tener una Constitución de tipo clásico; las regiones ultraperiféricas, por citar un artículo que nada tiene que ver con el constitucionalismo clásico, tienen naturaleza y trascendencia constitucional para Europa.

En segundo lugar, la solución sobre las categorías de competencias. Es buena. No perdamos de vista el funcionalismo que tanto nos ha servido. No caigamos en listas de competencias, pero clarifiquemos esas competencias.

Y en tercer lugar, de las instituciones debatiremos, pero todos tenemos claro que queremos más Europa, que queremos una Europa más integrada y que queremos la prevalencia del método comunitario allí donde pueda haber lugar a él. A partir de aquí, debatamos y pongamos como tercera fase esa Constitución que los ciudadanos están esperando. <BRK>

Duff (PE). - Mr President, I, too welcome the publication of this draft. I believe it will serve as a splendid basis for our future work.

But can I ask by what type of process are we going to agree the structure and architecture of the Treaty? Clearly, we are not able to complete the debate this morning, but it is important that a strong consensus forms upon the structural format.

I would have preferred a clearer definition of who the Union's legislature is, and who is its executive. I do not think that the citizen will be satisfied if all we deliver is a series of procedures. A clearer commitment to explaining our law-making and executive processes will be essential.

I question the necessity of a clause on reinforced co-operation. Amsterdam has proven there is no need for such a luxury, and I would prefer an associate membership for Member States who are unable to accept the political objectives of the EU.

I would also like to see in the first article, a reference to the people. "We, the people" is perhaps going too far, but a complete absence of a reference to popular sovereignty to complement state sovereignty seems to be a mistake.

I will have to stop there, but I have 44 more points that I could have made.

Barnier (CE). – Monsieur le Président, je voudrais effectivement faire deux ou trois observations rapides. La première, comme Karl Hänsch et d'autres l'ont dit, vise à faire remarquer que le travail proposé sous votre impulsion par le Praesidium a débouché sur un document clair, cohérent, une sorte de colonne vertébrale, terme que je préfère à squelette, sur lequel maintenant, à partir des groupes de travail, nous allons devoir mettre des muscles, de la chair, en d'autres mots créer cette Constitution.

Je veux dire aussi que c'est un document qui exprime une démarche courageuse puisque nous nous proposons à nous-mêmes de refonder, de restructurer l'ensemble des Traités, en quelque sorte dans un moment historique où l'Union s'élargit, où l'Europe se réunifie. Nous faisons une mise à plat, nous refaisons le point ensemble et nous nous proposons de réaffirmer l'engagement de tous les peuples.

Je me permettrai une observation en faisant une relecture précise de l'article 14 afin d'éviter un malentendu. Dans cet article, Monsieur le Président, on peut lire entre le premier alinéa et le deuxième, que, s'agissant des Institutions de l'Union dont nous parlerons dans quelques temps, il faut éviter une inquiétude ou un risque. Nous réaffirmons dans le premier alinéa que l'Union dispose d'un cadre institutionnel unique et, dans le second, il est proposé une distinction entre l'exercice des compétences qui appartiennent, dans leur totalité ou en partie, à l'Union et l'exercice de compétence exercé conjointement par les Etats membres. Depuis Maastricht, il me semble que cette distinction-là, qui a été très prononcée à une certaine époque entre la Communauté d'un côté et les Etats membres de l'autre a été abandonnée. Quand Javier Solana s'exprime devant le Conseil de sécurité, il ne le fait pas au nom des Etats membres conjoints, il le fait au nom de l'Union. Quand Monsieur Moratinos représente l'Europe au Proche-Orient, il le fait au nom de l'Union et non pas au nom des Etats membres conjoints. Je voulais simplement vous dire la lecture que je fais de ce passage en souhaitant qu'on ne revienne pas en arrière, à un vocabulaire qui appartient à une autre époque de l'Union et de la construction européenne mais que l'on aille bien de l'avant comme vous nous y avez invité hier. <BRK>

Martikonis (Gouv.-LT). - Mr President, at the start of the Convention in the spring, you called upon us to work upon the Constitutional Treaty. I think, as I thought then, that this is a great objective.

I must confess that in Lithuania at the moment, the enlargement debate is taking precedence over the debate on the future. I can however assure you that we will do our best to make an appropriate contribution to this debate and I can only welcome, as previous speakers have, the fact that we were able to stick to the goals foreseen at the beginning of the Convention.

We will continue our discussion by putting flesh on the draft project which you presented to us, and strive to improve and increase its clarity by consolidating its content. This is a real requirement. Some gaps need filling in. But it is my understanding that the reshaping of the architecture of the Union will not change its political and legal nature. If I understand it correctly, the draft does not imply this.

The reason I say this is because there will soon be ten countries who will be subscribing and ratifying the existing Treaties and the architecture of the Union, perhaps even by referendums. To some of us, it is an historical and important political act. I would ask for the assurance that none of our discussions or decisions give the impression that the present architecture, principles or institutions are unimportant or indeed obsolete. This is very important to my country, and we will make every effort to ensure that the transition is consistent and coherent. I count on your support. <BRK>

Haenel (Parl.-FR). – Merci Monsieur le Président. Au stade où nous en étions dans les débats de la Convention, nous avons besoin d'un cadre général de travail. L'avant-projet de Constitution répond tout à fait à cette nécessité. Il vient à point nommé.. C'est un document de travail indispensable à ce stade de nos travaux.

Cependant, j'aimerais faire deux remarques. La première est que dans le projet de Constitution, on distingue une première et une deuxième partie. Mais tant qu'on ne précise pas les mécanismes de révision entre la première et la deuxième partie, il n'est pas possible, selon moi, de se prononcer sur la pertinence de la répartition des différents sujets entre la première et la deuxième partie.

La deuxième est qu'il n'y a pas de disposition relative aux Parlements nationaux. Or, je rappelle, que dans le Traité d'Amsterdam, il y avait un protocole sur le rôle des Parlements nationaux. Il me paraît assez logique qu'après Nice et Laeken, il y ait des dispositions spécifiques aux Parlements nationaux incluses dans la Constitution. Je crois que les débats que nous avons eus hier sur le rapport de Gisela Stuart ont bien démontré la nécessité, quelque part dans la Constitution, d'une référence au rôle des Parlements nationaux. <BRK>

Borrell Fontelles (Parl.-ES). - Señor Presidente, ciertamente necesitábamos un marco y lo tenemos. Hay que felicitar por ello, porque la Convención va avanzando y demuestra que es posible pasar del Tratado a la Constitución. Que es posible pasar, de los acuerdos entre Estados, a la voluntad de un pueblo europeo que emerge.

Habr  mucho que discutir todav a, pero tenemos un marco de referencia y la opini n p blica saluda positivamente que lo tengamos.

En mi opini n, hay que hacer sitio a los Parlamentos nacionales. Quiero secundar las palabras del representante del Parlamento franc s. Hay que hacer m s sitio a la dimensi n social de Europa, en este esqueleto no hay suficiente. Me congratulo que se hable de cohesi n econ mica, social y territorial. Pero los aspectos de la Europa social deben ser m s desarrollados. Quien haya hecho el esqueleto no les ha dado la importancia que, en mi opini n, tienen las materias sociales y de empleo. Y una de las caracter sticas fundamentales de la Europa que hemos hecho y queremos hacer es precisamente su dimensi n social. Los ciudadanos esperan de la construcci n europea que contribuya a resolver sus problemas cotidianos, que contribuya a aportar soluciones a sus problemas existenciales: la protecci n frente a la vejez y a la enfermedad, el empleo, la formaci n, el acceso al saber y al bienestar. Saben que los pa ses solos no pueden ya aportar respuestas eficientes a estos problemas.

Si la Constituci n Europea no los recoge plenamente, a nivel de los valores, de los principios que la sustentan y las pol ticas que debe desarrollar, los ciudadanos echar n algo en falta.

Entre los valores hay que hacer lugar tambi n al valor de la solidaridad -que no est  presente-, y al de la igualdad de oportunidades entre hombres y mujeres -que tampoco lo est -, y al desarrollo sostenible -que no lo est  suficientemente. Europa no puede ser s lo un mercado, es lo que ha servido para construirla, pero, de cara a ma ana, los valores de la solidaridad, del desarrollo sostenible, de la igualdad entre g neros, tienen que ocupar un lugar m s claro del que tienen.

Hay que insistir en que los procedimientos de toma de decisiones deben permitir una Uni n m s eficiente. S  que ese tema todav a no ha sido objeto de la discusi n necesaria. Me permito simplemente se alarlo.

En su conjunto, pues, se or Presidente, satisfacci n por el paso que hemos dado en este Pleno de la Convenci n y buen  nimo para acabar de rellenar, como dec a el Comisario Barnier, con carne, con m sculo, con fuerza, la estructura que hoy conocemos. <BRK>

De Vries (Gov.-NL). -Mr President, colleagues, we are about to embrace ten new Member States in the European Union. That is a very positive thing. It will make the Union more European. But at the same time, it entails certain risks, and we should be aware of them: risks of greater complexity, and greater difficulty in reaching decisions.

We will see more centrifugal forces in the Union. We therefore need to counterbalance those forces with forces that help the Union to act effectively. We do not need, I believe, a more inter-governmental Union. We need a more integrated Union, a Union that is at the same time more effective, and more democratic.

For the Netherlands, there are two essential points that we would like this Convention to agree upon. Firstly, to maintain the balance among the institutions of the Union, and secondly, to strengthen each of these institutions. Let me be more explicit. The secret of the success of the Union has been firstly, the right of initiative of the European Commission, secondly, qualified majority voting in the Council, thirdly, co-decision of the European Parliament in legislative matters, and finally, the role of the Court of Justice as a final arbiter.

In the end, power must be subject to the law. So I will judge our proceedings on the basis of whether these four principles can be maintained and further strengthened.

It is difficult to say whether the draft we have in front of us will end up doing that. That will very much depend on our further discussions about substance. At the end of the day we have to agree about substance first and then form will follow. We should not agree the form, before we have had a full debate about the substance, including the institutions.

Two questions at this stage: first, and I echo Mr Lopes here, is it really necessary for the Union to have a fixed catalogue of competencies or should we perhaps retain the current system in the Treaty, which talks about the instruments of the Union, without fixing competencies concretely?

Secondly, do we really need new institutions, such as a fixed Presidency of the European Council and a new Assembly? I am doubtful about that. It seems to me the Luxembourg Prime Minister, Mr Juncker, was right, when he remarked that perhaps our Union does not need more institutions, it needs more ambition, it needs more effectiveness and more democracy.

So I welcome this draft, President, but I would like to reserve my final judgement until we have had the debate about substance, and about the strengthening of the four institutions, that make up the success of our Union. <BRK>

Le Président. – Je vous rappelle qu'il n'y a pas de débat sur le fond. Nous ne pouvons pas aborder le débat sur le fond par quelques remarques sur une Institution ou sur une autre. Il s'agit là de l'architecture, c'est-à-dire de l'ordre dans lequel les problèmes seront traités. Cette demande d'architecture a été formulée par la Convention en mai et en juin. Nous avons répondu à sa demande. Il va de soi que les questions de fond feront l'objet de débats ultérieurs. La parole est à Monsieur Lamassoure. <BRK>

Lamassoure (PE). – Je vous remercie Monsieur le Président. Pour ma part, je fais partie de ceux qui trouvent que c'est une bonne architecture. Et je tiens à vous en féliciter ainsi que le Praesidium. Je voudrais insister sur la méthode de travail qui va être la nôtre maintenant. Parce qu'au fond, quand on fait le bilan de la première génération des groupes de travail, on se rend compte que ce bilan est globalement assez décevant. Pourquoi? Parce que les groupes de travail n'avaient pas de grandes orientations. Puisque maintenant nous avons une architecture qui fait l'objet d'un large consensus, il est souhaitable que nous engagions maintenant le débat de fond, le débat sur les Institutions que nous souhaitons, en le faisant précéder d'un débat sur ce que nous attendons de l'Union, en reprenant, en approfondissant le débat du printemps.

En effet, on se rend compte, à partir des travaux de la première génération de groupe de travail, que par rapport à une fédération classique, nous attendons de l'Union européenne deux choses de caractère complètement différent. D'une part, nous lui attribuons des compétences, complètes ou partagées avec l'Union. Ce sont là des problèmes que nous avons traité, nous avons quarante ans d'expérience et nous voyons comment nous pouvons améliorer le triangle institutionnel. Mais d'autre part, et c'est là la particularité de l'Union européenne, nous voulons aussi coordonner ensemble des politiques qui restent fondamentalement des politiques de compétence nationale, et je dirais même de compétence nationale à cent pour cent. C'est le cas des politiques budgétaires depuis l'Union monétaire et ce sera vraisemblablement le cas d'autres politiques comme la politique de défense. Or, l'exemple du budget montre que nous sommes incapables de coordonner des politiques nationales. Cela ne se passe pas bien aujourd'hui pour le budget et il est à craindre que cela ne se passe pas bien non plus pour d'autres politiques demain. Ce sont des problèmes nouveaux par rapport aux problèmes communautaires. Je citerai deux exemples. Premièrement, peut-on prétendre coordonner des politiques nationales qui sont au coeur des pouvoirs des Parlements nationaux sans y associer, d'une manière ou d'une autre, les Parlementaires nationaux ? Selon moi, la réponse est non. Deuxièmement, s'il y a des Etats en infraction par rapport à une règle de coordination, qui va les condamner? Si c'est le Conseil, comment éviter que les grands pays n'aient plus d'influence que les petits. Le Conseil osera-t-il condamner un grand Etat ? On voit bien que ce n'est pas le cas aujourd'hui. Et si c'est la Commission, quelle légitimité démocratique ou politique donner à la Commission pour qu'elle ait ce pouvoir véritable et éviter ainsi qu'un Parlement national qui vient d'être élu, par exemple, ne rejette d'un revers de la main les critiques de la Commission en demandant ce que sont ces avis de technocrate apatride. Ces exemples démontrent que pour ces fonctions-là, que nous attendons de l'Union, nous avons des problèmes très différents de l'exercice des compétences, encore une fois qu'elles soient exclusives ou partagées. Je propose donc, Monsieur le Président, que nous commençons à débattre de cela. Le squelette est beau. Avons-nous besoin, à partir de là, de créer une femme, un homme ou un couple? On a besoin de le savoir pour y mettre la chair. Je vous remercie. <BRK>

Hain (Ch.E/G.-GB). - Mr President, I agree with Mr Peter De Vries of the Netherlands, that we need to maintain the institutional balance, and strengthen each institution. This text is a good start. I welcome it as an important step towards settling our constitution for a generation or more.

Some comments: firstly, I would like to see an inspirational preamble to this Treaty. However, I would like it to be as short a text as possible, setting up what the European Union is, what its objectives and values are, and who does what.

The EU will only reconnect with its citizens if we have a concise constitution that people can read and really understand. Secondly, the draft adopts the technique of including the common foreign and security policy provisions throughout the text, rather than as a freestanding chapter. This could work, but our citizens will want to be absolutely clear that different ways of working apply to the common foreign and security policy.

Thirdly, I do not favour this Convention debating a name change. I agree with Mr Lopes from Portugal. The European Union is a successful brand name, a name we are all proud of. Let us not open an unnecessary debate. Frankly, The United States of Europe, or indeed United Europe are not acceptable names. United States of Europe implies a super-state. United Europe looks to me like a football team.

Nor are the words about citizenship acceptable in the draft. We are already citizens of the European Union. We do not have to choose between national and European identity: we can, and do, have both. To create a separate, freestanding European citizenship, as implied, is an unnecessary confusion. As we try to find agreement on a final text, our watchwords must be clarity, democracy and efficiency, in a New Europe that is a union of sovereign states. Well done, and let us keep at it! <BRK>

Piks (Parl.-LV). - Mr President, dear colleagues, the discussion on the EU basic treaty has just started.

Yesterday, the President of the Convention presented the first draft for the basic Treaty, which marks the beginning of a new stage in the Convention's work, and I would like to congratulate the Presidium. The basic structures have now been created. These must now be completed with formulations and details.

It is my strong belief that the basic content of the Treaty will be rooted in the outcome of the discussions at the Convention plenary sessions and working groups. What the basic Treaty must do is place the individual at the heart of its activities. It should also contribute to the preservation and development of European common values, while also respecting the diversity of cultures, traditions and language. The uniqueness of the nation states, and identities of the regions should continue to be respected.

The Charter of the EU institutions should envisage the maintenance of the current division of competencies, between the Commission, the Council and Parliament in the legislative process. A gradual transition from unanimity to qualified majority is necessary to preserve the efficiency of the decision-making process in an enlarged EU. However, unanimity should continue to be used in highly sensitive areas, such as defence policy.

The general arrangement of the European Union institutions and their role should be maintained. The working practices of the institutions must fully respect the principle of transparency. The Community method has ensured success in establishing a common EU market, economic and monetary union. By strengthening the Commission's role in the EU policies, the Commission's capacity to define common EU policies and act as a guardian of the common interest could be extended.

In the light of enlargement, the importance of the question of co-operation with neighbouring countries will become even more important. We are therefore in favour of creating a framework of privileged licensing between the Union and its neighbouring states. The remaining question is whether these provisions will be included in the basic Treaty. <BRK>

Hübner (Gouv.-PL). - Mr President, I agree with those colleagues who said that the real challenge would be to fill this otherwise excellent draft with more substance. Today, I would like to raise an important issue.

The subject of the session is the "Preliminary Draft Constitutional Treaty", but then in the text, the word "Constitution" appears, and I am strongly in favour of calling our efforts the "Convention work on the Constitution", not the "Constitutional Treaty".

I believe, Mr President, that aiming for a constitution has already had a positive impact on the contents. Selecting a constitutional path, due to the very nature of the constitution, is also an excellent way of simplifying the Treaty. It is also very positive for the citizens as the word "Constitution" has a solid value. I also believe that "Constitution" builds what I would call the "citizens' identity", something we all care about. From the legal point of view, I believe that the EU deserves a solid document, and the Constitution lives up to this requirement.

Last but not least, we have had several Treaties, so far, and I believe that the time has come, for something of greater significance. We should move from the idea of just the Treaty to something we could call a Constitution. <BRK>

Follini (Parl.-IT). - Signor Presidente, gli antichi filosofi greci ci hanno spiegato che la tartaruga arrivava prima del velocissimo Achille e quindi io, memore di questo, desidero rivolgere a lei e alla sua tartaruga gli apprezzamenti per il lavoro che ci ha presentato.

Mi permetto tre osservazioni telegrafiche. La prima: abbiamo intrapreso la strada della semplificazione e credo che su questa strada dobbiamo proseguire, anche a costo di qualche difetto di immaginazione. Con questo spirito io ritengo che l'articolo 19 - quello riguardante il Congresso dei popoli d'Europa - possa essere essere tralasciato.

La seconda: c'è una sequenza per la quale il Consiglio precede il Parlamento e il Parlamento precede la Commissione. Io non so se si tratti di una priorità logica, di una priorità politica; se però non si tratta, come mi pare di capire, di una priorità casuale, credo che questo equilibrio, questo assetto dei poteri si giustifichi se, d'altro canto, sugli articoli 29 e 30 e sull'articolo 41 - quelli che riguardano la politica internazionale e l'azione dell'Unione nel mondo - siamo in condizioni di tracciare delle soluzioni molto forti e molto chiare.

Terza e ultima osservazione: la vita democratica dell'Unione richiede che vi sia un elettorato europeo, che si esprima in quanto tale e non come somma dei diversi elettorati nazionali. Definire questo elettorato europeo mi sembra appropriato. Se riuscissimo a farlo già a partire dalla convalida di questo Trattato, la tartaruga avrebbe fatto un passo da giaguaro. <BRK>

Roche (Ch.E./G.-IE). - Mr President, first of all I would like to congratulate and compliment you on the excellent work you have done. This is a draft that everyone can welcome. The idea of a single, simplified Treaty will make the whole Union more intelligible to the citizens, and that must be welcome. I very much agree with you that a single, institutional structure, as envisaged in the draft, does not imply uniformity of procedural arrangements across the policy areas.

I share some concerns that have already been voiced here about the institutional arrangements. We have a shared interest, I believe, in strengthening all the institutions: the Commission, the Council, and the Parliament. We also have a shared interest, I believe, in maintaining the balance.

One concern that I would mention, even at this very early stage, is a concern that I have about the concept of a President of the European Council, distinct from the Presidency of the Council of Ministers. I fear that this would create a source of potential tension.

I agree with Mr Lopes, and others, regarding the name of the Union. The idea of a United States of Europe is not attractive. "The European Union" is a name we have learned to live with and to accept. The rotation of the Presidency is going to be very important in the future, again Mr Lopes has raised this, and we can deal with it another day.

I would like, Mr President, at this stage to thank you and compliment you for the work. In the period ahead, we now have a framework within which we can operate - a framework that will produce a more coherent Europe, and a Europe that will be closer to the citizens. <BRK>

Tiilikainen (Ch.E./G.-FI). - Mr President, I also would like to thank the Presidium for having the courage to put the draft treaty on the table at this stage. So far the Convention has not taken decisions on many issues and that is why I do not think there can be much content in the Treaty.

On some points however the strategy goes too far. I refer to the previous statements made here today. In some cases, it even undermines the role of the Convention, particularly in the field of the institutional issues. I refer to the fact that, whereas we have not been debating institutional issues, the whole debate has not been open for the Convention. There is very little in the Treaty that will guide our future deliberations in this field. In this respect there are statements concerning various presidencies' references to possible amendments to the structure of the Commission that should not be there.

Even the idea of a People's Congress did not gain any remarkable support here yesterday, so I share the view of Mr Lopes and Mr de Vries that instead of creating new institutions, we should strengthen the present ones that have proved successful. I refer to the Community method and to the Commission as a promoter of the common interest.

Another arrangement that should not be included in the new Treaty as it currently stands is the way the common foreign and security policy is placed in terms of the categories of competencies implementation and instruments. Mr Dehaene's group on External Affairs is currently discussing the best means of increasing the coherence of external relations. I think the result of this working group should define the place of the whole range of external relations in this new Treaty.

Lastly, I would like to repeat the question of Mr Duff, concerning the way in which we are to take decisions on this new structure. <BRK>

Γιαννάκου-Κουτσίκου (Parl.-GR). - Κύριε Πρόεδρε, θα είμαι επιγραμματική. Μπράβο στο Προεδρείο για το σχέδιο αυτό που θα διευκολύνει και τους αναγκαίους συμβιβασμούς, γιατί πρέπει να υπάρξει μία πρόταση προς το Ευρωπαϊκό Συμβούλιο. Η Ευρωπαϊκή

Ένωση, νομίζω, θα μπορούσε να ονομαστεί Ηνωμένη Ευρώπη, να έχει ενιαία νομική προσωπικότητα και να έχει ένα σύνταγμα κατανοητό στους πολίτες, χωρίς σύγχυση αρμοδιοτήτων.

Πρέπει να περιλαμβάνεται ένα προοίμιο που θα αφορά στις αξίες και τις αρχές. Γιατί οι αξίες και οι αρχές δημιουργούν κοινό συμφέρον για τους ευρωπαίους πολίτες, αλλά και για τις ηγεσίες τους. Η ιθαγένεια και ο Χάρτης των Θεμελιωδών Δικαιωμάτων είναι εκ των ων ουκ άνευ για το στόχο αυτό. Είναι απόλυτη ανάγκη να αποκτήσουμε ενιαία πολιτική δικαιοσύνης, ασφάλειας, εξωτερικών σχέσεων και άμυνας, γιατί μόνο έτσι θα ενισχύσουμε τη διεθνή μας παρουσία.

Το Ευρωπαϊκό Συμβούλιο, κύριε Πρόεδρε, δεν χρειάζεται ένα μη οργανικό μέλος του ως Πρόεδρο, διότι θα δημιουργηθούν νέοι γραφειοκρατικοί μηχανισμοί. Ούτε πρέπει να αποδυναμωθεί η Ευρωπαϊκή Επιτροπή. Ούτε τα εθνικά Κοινοβούλια πρέπει να παρεμβαίνουν ex ante στο ρόλο των υπερεθνικών αρχών. Τα εθνικά κοινοβούλια ως πάρουν εξουσίες από τις κυβερνήσεις τους, που δεν τους παραχωρούν τις πραγματικές εξουσίες που έπρεπε να τους έχουν παραχωρηθεί.

Το άρθρο 42 είναι σημαντικό. Η Ευρώπη δεν μπορεί να επεκτείνεται συνεχώς άκριτα προς πάσαν κατεύθυνση. Πρέπει να αποκτήσει ειδικές σχέσεις με τρίτες χώρες.

Τέλος, κύριε Πρόεδρε, το σημαντικότερο από όλα είναι το εξής: εκεί που μπορούμε να ασκήσουμε πολιτικές είναι η καθημερινότητα των πολιτών, δηλαδή τα ζητήματα της απασχόλησης, τα προβλήματα του περιθωρίου, της εκπαίδευσης, της υγείας, του πολιτισμού. Εκεί είναι οι εστίες κινδύνου για την Ευρώπη, εκεί όπου κατά τα άλλα η ευημερούσα Ευρώπη μπορεί να αναπτύξει, δυστυχώς, περιθώριο και πολιτικά άκρα. <BRK>

Maij-Weggen (PE). - Voorzitter, in de eerste plaats mijn waardering voor deze globale opzet. Ik denk dat deze goed beantwoordt aan wat de Conventie heeft gevraagd en ik denk dat we er ook allemaal heel blij mee kunnen zijn. Ik ben erg blij dat er een constitutioneel gedeelte zit in het ontwerp en dat wordt voorzien in opname van het Handvest. Ik ben ook positief over de federale inslag en de bevoegdheidsverdeling, een beetje in lijn met de heer Lamassoure. Ik ben heel blij dat de pijlers opzij geschoven worden, dat lijkt me een goede zaak. Het is ook goed dat er wordt voorzien in eigen middelen - ik denk dat we daar nog een goede discussie over moeten hebben -, dat het lidmaatschap nader wordt beschreven en dat er sprake kan zijn van schorsing, maar ook van de mogelijkheid om uit te treden.

Er zijn ook een paar punten waar ik niet tevreden over ben. Ik denk dat we de naam van de Europese Unie niet ter discussie moeten stellen. Het woord Europese Unie is prima. Ik denk ook dat we niet de suggestie moeten wekken dat er nu plotseling een Europees burgerschap ontstaat: dat stond al in artikel 8 van het Verdrag van Maastricht.

Derde punt, ik vind dat het accent te veel ligt op de Europese Raad en de Europese ministerraad. Verder lijkt het mij geen goed idee om het permanent voorzitterschap voor de Europese Raad te creëren, en ook niet om de Hoge Vertegenwoordiger te institutionaliseren: die moet mijns inziens samenvallen met de commissaris voor de externe betrekkingen in de Europese Commissie. Zo ontstaat namelijk bij mij het ongemakkelijke gevoel dat de intergouvernementele inslag in dit ontwerp te groot is ten koste van het communautaire. Als dat zo is, dan zullen we daar corrigerend moeten optreden.

Tenslotte, voorzitter, ik ben ook geen voorstander van instelling van een congres. Ik zou het wel goed vinden als de Conventie verankerd werd in het VEU. Maar globaal gesproken ben ik positief over het ontwerp en over de rest zullen we zeker nog in het komend half jaar met elkaar te spreken komen. <BRK>

Brok (PE). - Herr Präsident! Ich möchte Ihnen als Präsidium meinen Glückwunsch zu diesem Entwurf aussprechen. Ich glaube, dass es das entsprechende Gerüst liefert, auf dessen Grundlage wir die Arbeiten der nächsten Wochen und Monate in Angriff nehmen können, und ich glaube, dass es nicht notwendig ist zu streiten, ob etwas in Artikel 7 oder Artikel 12 steht, sondern ich glaube, dass dies eine Grundlage ist, die einen fairen Kompromiss darstellt. Wir wollen eine Europäische Union aus unserer politischen Familie heraus, ein integriertes Europa, kein intergouvernementales. Deswegen sollte die Möglichkeit des Intergouvernementalismus, die ja optional in diesen Vorschlägen noch enthalten ist, sorgfältig beachtet und möglichst umschifft werden. Das wird natürlich die Aufgabe sein, die wir im Rahmen dieses Konvents weiter zu erörtern haben.

Ich hätte noch einige wenige Vorschläge zu machen, die man vielleicht hinzufügen könnte, wenn man von den Ausgangspositionen ausgeht. Sie sprechen in Artikel 1 von den Staaten Europas. Wir sollten betonen, dass es eine Union der Staaten und der Völker Europas ist. Ich glaube, beides zusammen macht die Europäische Union aus, und ich glaube, dass wir uns auch auf dieser Ebene finden könnten. Auch die Austrittsklausel ist ein Problem. Wenn ein Staat wirklich ernsthaft austreten will - das zeigt das Beispiel Grönland - gibt es keine Schwierigkeit damit -, aber dieses als ständiges Angebot zu haben, ist eine Verführung für manche innenpolitischen Diskussionen, und ich glaube, dass man das unter solchen psychologischen Gesichtspunkten noch einmal nüchtern untersuchen sollte. Wichtig scheint mir zu sein, dass die Grundrechtecharta vielleicht nicht erst in Artikel 6 oder 7 auftaucht, sondern dass dies als Beispiel für das Europa der Bürger an der Spitze steht.

Wir müssen natürlich großen Wert darauf legen, dass bei der Zweiteilung, die hier vorgenommen wurde, die wesentlichen Bestimmungen, die Beantwortung der Machtfrage der Europäischen Union, in dem ersten Teil beinhaltet ist. Ich glaube, auch darüber müssen wir uns, wenn es um die Detailaufteilung geht, im Einzelnen noch unterhalten. Es ist eine ganz entscheidende Frage, ob uns dies gelingen könnte.

Ich möchte das gerne so zusammenfassen: Sie haben einen Vorschlag unterbreitet, in dem sie von einer bundesstaatlichen Struktur ausgehen. Der Vorschlag enthält aber immer noch einige intergouvernementale Fallstricke, und diese Fallstricke sind offengelegt, so dass wir sie leicht umgehen können, wenn wir es denn wollen. <BRK>

Fayot (Parl.-LU). – Monsieur le Président, il est significatif que vous nous ayez présenté cette architecture d'une Constitution à peu près au même moment où le Conseil européen décidait de l'élargissement de 15 à 25. Je trouve que c'est une coïncidence sinon historique, en tout cas fort significative. Cela va nous forcer à pousser l'intégration de l'Union européenne afin d'éviter que cette Union européenne ne devienne une zone de libre-échange.

Nous avons donc l'obligation dans ce travail sur la Constitution européenne de pousser à l'approfondissement de la construction européenne.

L'architecture que vous nous proposez présente de nombreux aspects intéressants. Je pensais effectivement que c'est maintenant que commence véritablement le travail de notre Convention sur des textes. Il sera important de voir exactement comment se fera ce travail, si nous constituerons des groupes de travail, si nous travaillerons en plénière par des amendements, si nous aurons la possibilité de discuter à fond de ce texte que je n'appellerai par un texte martyre, Monsieur le Président, par respect pour vous. En effet, je pense que c'est tout de même un texte par rapport auquel nous allons garder toute notre liberté, surtout en ce qui concerne les différents points un peu plus controversés.

Je souhaiterais apporter une dernière remarque. Personnellement, je trouve que les titres 1 et 2 pourraient être plus centrés sur les citoyens européens. Je pense que nous rédiger une Constitution dans laquelle devrait apparaître, comme l'a dit Monsieur Brok, en premier lieu la Charte. Ce premier titre centré sur le citoyen européen "L'Union conçue comme une communauté de citoyens réunis par les mêmes valeurs et des objectifs communs" pourrait rapprocher une nouvelle fois la Constitution de nos citoyens. C'est l'objectif essentiel que nous devons essayer d'atteindre. Merci. <BRK>

Frendo (Parl.-MT). – Mr President, I warmly welcome this document, as I believe it to be an important basis for our discussion. It is crucial for our Convention that such a document be adopted, both for the credibility of the Convention, and to show that the Convention itself has been a success.

I have a few points to make. The first one relates to fundamental rights. I think that fundamental rights should, in fact, be in a chapter of their own. Fundamental rights refer to rights that are applicable throughout Europe, and therefore are something that should be treated separately in the document.

I also think it important that in the structure of the constitutional document itself there should be a clear distinction between those legislative processes which are binding and those which are not. I am sure the citizens of Europe would like to understand this distinction as well.

Thirdly, it seems to me that the principle of solidarity is missing from the text. The issue of solidarity was raised in this Convention a number of times, and you, Mr President, also embraced it at one of the earlier meetings. I truly think we need a specific clause on the concept of solidarity. This has been one of the fundamental reasons for the success of the Union. It should, in my view, be a principle of governance. We could discuss later whether this should be a principle of justice. <BRK>

McAvan (PE). – Mr President, I think the document shows that we are now on the home strait of our work, and we will deliver what we set out to do. It is a skeleton and I would now like to add my own pound of flesh to it.

Yes, of course we need solidarity. It is a very important principle of the Union's work. We also need equality between men and women. That cannot be omitted. There are very few women here, and we must not overlook half the population.

Thirdly, something people have not mentioned - Europe is a multicultural society. We already have a declaration against racism and xenophobia. Let us now add something about that in the values of the European Union. Never has this been more relevant than at this period of time, when the far right and xenophobia are growing on our continent.

There were, however, a couple of surprises, Mr President. For example, the big debate on the name. I do not think we need to re-brand the Union at the moment, as people know what it is. As for the concept of dual citizenship, I am not sure where that idea comes from. It is not one we have discussed here before, and I am unsure how helpful these two items have been in the context of debating these things with the public.

Peter Hain mentioned a preamble. He spoke about an inspirational text, and he is right. We need something which explains the whys and wherefores of the European Union, which can be talked about in schools, colleges, and pensioners' groups, so that people understand what the European Union is about.

As Mr Fayot has just said, timing is important. It is another piece in the jigsaw, which will bring us towards the enlarged Union. It is another piece that will result in a Union based on democracy. <BRK>

Hjelm-Wallén (Ch.E/G.-SE). - Herr ordförande! Jag vill också säga att jag anser att strukturen är god på det upplägg som vi har fått. Jag hoppas att vi under resans gång skall komma ihåg att det allra viktigaste är att vi gör hela dokumentet begripligt för en allmänhet. Att allmänheten förstår vad EU är till för och hur besluten i huvudsak går till är utomordentligt viktigt.

Mycket återstår naturligtvis att göra vad gäller innehållet. En del saker saknas. Linda McAvan nämnde just jämställdhetsfrågan, dvs. jämställdhet mellan kvinnor och män, och även det multikulturella Europa. En annan fråga som inte tas upp är ombudsmannen. Jag tycker också att innehållet ibland kan vara för omfattande. När det skapas en särskild rubrik i andra delen som heter försvarsfrågor, så ifrågasätter jag det. Det kan nämligen inte jämföras med externa åtgärder eller den inre politiken, utan det blir en ojämnhet som jag tycker måste ses över.

Slutligen vill jag säga att jag beklagar att den utåtriktade debatten i flera av våra länder har startat med rubriker som egentligen handlar om ett enda begrepp, nämligen "Europas förenta stater". Så vitt jag vet, har benämningen på vårt framtida samarbete överhuvudtaget inte diskuterats i konventet. Jag tycker därför att det är väldigt olyckligt att vi nu genom denna benämningsfråga har startat en pseudodebatt som inte har någonting med innehållet att göra. Jag hoppas att det skall kunna rättas till så snart som möjligt. <BRK>

Bonde (PE). - Hr. formand, jeg har for mange dage siden indskrevet mig på talerlisten til debatten om charteret og til dette punkt. Jeg har omhyggeligt forberedt to taler og får nu alt i alt et minut. Må jeg ikke opfordre til, at man næste gang tilrettelægger møderne noget bedre.

Jeg vil rejse et punkt, og det er Giscard's forslag om kun at lave en føderation for dem, der godtager det nye. Hvis et land spørger sine borgere, om de stemmer nej, så er det ud af EU. Giscard stillede sit forslag i "Der Spiegel", uden at det var diskuteret i Konventet. Kan vi ikke få punktet sat på dagsordenen til en særlig debat, så vi kan få en fornemmelse af, om vi skal deltage i et retskaffent Konvent eller en fransk revolution. Og så er jeg enig i, at vi skal have Ombudsmanden med ind i teksten. <BRK>

Moscovici (Ch.E/G.-FR). – Monsieur le Président, je voudrais d'abord vous féliciter, ainsi que le Praesidium, pour la qualité du travail effectué et que vous avez présenté hier. C'est un moment important et je crois que le squelette ou la colonne vertébrale répond effectivement à nos attentes sur trois angles : tout d'abord, en répondant à la préoccupation que nous partageons tous d'un texte simple, lisible et facile d'accès afin de permettre aux citoyens européens de mieux s'approprier de l'Europe et de son projet; deuxièmement, c'est tout à votre honneur, en prenant fidèlement en considération les réflexions et les contributions qui ont été apportées à la Convention depuis plusieurs mois tout en laissant ouvertes de très nombreuses possibilités institutionnelles prometteuses; et troisièmement, en mettant, selon moi, la Convention face à ses responsabilités à partir d'une approche ambitieuse. Il y a là un dessein de rénovation de la méthode communautaire et c'est tout à fait fondamental. Nous disposons donc maintenant d'une base de travail incontestable et je l'entends ici, tout à fait incontestée.

Vous avez dit vous-même, Monsieur le Président, qu'il ne s'agissait pas aujourd'hui de se pencher sur le fond. Je me contenterai donc de deux réflexions. La première vise à répondre à Peter Hain au sujet de l'Europe Unie. Car le fait que cela fasse penser à un club de football tel que Manchester United, Leeds United, etc. devrait plutôt le conforter dans ce choix parce que ceci est très britannique au fond. Il faudrait donc qu'il y réfléchisse. Ma deuxième réflexion est plus sérieuse. Elle porte sur ce que nous devons ajouter, à savoir la chair. Il y a un squelette, il y a une architecture institutionnelle bien pensée mais il faudra aussi penser au contenu, c'est-à-dire aux politiques communes, dont il me semble que nous pourrions encore davantage développer la place dans la première partie du Traité. <BRK>

Le Président. – Voilà, il nous reste maintenant dix orateurs. Nous avons regardé les possibilités et je crois que la meilleure solution, c'est de les inscrire en tête de notre débat de la prochaine session, le vendredi matin. Nous garderions une heure, cela leur permettra d'avoir suffisamment de temps pour s'exprimer. Si, en effet, nous continuions, je ne pourrais pas vous répondre, ce qui serait quelque peu regrettable pour les interventions puisque nous devons interrompre nos travaux à 13 h. Donc, à partir de M. Lekberg, et je m'en excuse auprès de lui, jusqu'au trentième qui est M. Farnleitner, ce serait le vendredi de la prochaine session à 9h30, on garderait une heure pour vos interventions, si vous en étiez d'accord.

Je voudrais essayer de répondre à vos observations très pertinentes et parfois même bienveillantes qui ont été faites au cours de ce débat.

Je commencerai par le début, à savoir les remarques de M. Hänsch et de Mme Palacio, lesquels siègent au praesidium et ont donc été associés naturellement à l'élaboration de ce document qu'ils connaissent fort bien. M. Duff a posé comme question principale, la question sur la suite. Et si vous me le permettez, je la garderai pour la fin de mes réponses. Cette question est, en effet, évidemment fondamentale.

M. Barnier a salué le progrès que constitue le passage à un système institutionnel unique. Je ne voudrais pas, tout de même, que dans la Convention, et je crois que ce serait une erreur psychologique, quand nous faisons des avancées importantes, nous les sous-estimions. Voilà des années qu'on parle des trois piliers. Nous ferions disparaître les trois piliers. Nombreux sont ceux d'entre vous qui, ici ou là, ont dit: sera-t-on jamais débarrassés de ces trois piliers? Nous le proposons. Donc, on créerait un système institutionnel unique. C'est une avancée importante de l'organisation de l'Union européenne. Naturellement, les modes d'emploi des Institutions, et M. Lamassoure le disait tout à l'heure, seront adaptés au système de compétence, comme dans toute Constitution où il y a, en effet, des procédures particulières en fonction des questions traitées ou des systèmes de compétences. Il ne faut pas avoir l'idée simpliste – et je ne pense pas qu'ici, qui que ce soit ait des idées simplistes – que parce qu'il y a un système institutionnel unique, il y a une seule procédure. Non! Il y a des procédures adaptées à la nature des compétences puisque nous savons, nous l'avons répété, vous l'avez dit vous-mêmes, qu'il y aurait plusieurs systèmes de compétences.

Je crois que c'est M. Lopes qui a posé la question des procédures de révision. Nous n'avons pas abordé ce sujet, la question de savoir s'il devait y avoir ou non des procédures de révision différentes, c'est-à-dire pour la première partie et les parties suivantes. C'est une idée qui avait été avancée à certains moments du débat, à l'extérieur de notre Convention, mais que nous avons entendue. C'est assez complexe, parce qu'il n'y a pas une partie noble et une partie moins noble dans une Constitution. Tout est important. Et, d'ailleurs, on rappelait tout à l'heure qu'il faut mettre dans la partie constitutionnelle, par exemple, les procédures essentielles de décision. La procédure législative fait partie du dispositif constitutionnel. Et s'il y a des procédures nouvelles adaptées à l'Union européenne, comme la coopération ouverte, c'est à mettre aussi dans la partie constitutionnelle.

D'autre part, on risque d'avoir, chez certains membres de l'Union, un doute s'ils ont le sentiment qu'il y a une partie plus souple, plus incertaine du dispositif qui pourrait être modifiée de façon plus facile. On a souffert, dans le passé, du fonctionnement de certains articles dans lesquels il y avait bien une procédure de modification des compétences, d'élargissement des compétences, mais qui a été interprétée avec le temps de telle manière que le processus était insuffisamment transparent et se terminait finalement par une décision au Conseil qui n'était pas d'ailleurs une décision toujours du niveau des dirigeants véritables du Conseil. Je crois qu'il faut regarder ce point, nous ne l'avons pas traité. Nous verrons s'il faut une seule procédure de révision ou plusieurs.

Il a posé la question de la référence dans la Constitution, et je reviendrai tout à l'heure sur les Institutions, aux Parlements nationaux. Je vous dirai franchement qu'on ne peut pas considérer les Parlements nationaux comme une Institution de l'Union. Pas plus que les gouvernements ne sont d'ailleurs des Institutions de l'Union. Par contre, puisque l'on va donner des rôles aux Parlements nationaux, et notamment vous paraissez être d'accord sur un rôle concernant le système d'alerte précoce s'agissant de la subsidiarité, il y aura bien dans le texte des références aux Parlements nationaux. Et il faudra que ces références soient telles que l'implication de ces Parlements apparaisse clairement. Cela peut d'ailleurs intervenir à propos d'autres sujets ou d'autres Institutions.

Alors, Monsieur Lopes, c'est difficile pour nous. On nous dit, à Nice, "précisez les compétences". Et vous nous dites: "pas de catalogue de compétences". Que faire? Nous avons parlé de ce problème des compétences au début des travaux de la Convention. D'abord, il faut savoir qu'il y a un catalogue de compétences, que ce n'est pas une invention. L'article 3 du Traité de Rome est une énumération de compétences. On ne va pas le supprimer. Et d'ailleurs, s'il doit y avoir des compétences exclusives, il faut bien qu'elles soient dénommées. On ne peut pas dire qu'il existe des compétences exclusives et ne pas les citer.

La position qui a été prise par la Convention – ce n'était pas la mienne, mais je l'ai acceptée bien volontiers – est de dire qu'on ne fait pas deux catalogues de compétences, un catalogue pour l'Union, un catalogue pour les États, ce qui était la position de certains pays au départ de nos travaux. Mais il est bien évident que les compétences exclusives et partagées devront être énumérées comme elles le sont dans les traités actuels. Et donc, sur ce point, ce n'est pas du tout un recul, c'est simplement la confirmation des traités actuels.

Monsieur De Vries a dit: "il faudrait se mettre d'accord sur le fond avant de parler d'architecture". Je veux bien, mais, en fait, aux mois de mai et de juin, beaucoup d'entre vous ont dit: "c'est très difficile d'avancer si on n'a pas une carte de la route", c'est-à-dire si l'on ignore où les différentes questions trouveront leur place dans l'architecture. Nous en avons beaucoup parlé au sein de praesidium, nous avons travaillé sur ce texte et, par ce texte, nous avons répondu à une demande. Il ne s'agit pas là d'une initiative arbitraire du praesidium ou de la présidence.

La question centrale, en effet, qui a été posée par certains, est: "Est-ce une bonne architecture?". Et le véritable point, qui d'ailleurs curieusement n'a pas été évoqué, est la question de savoir: "fallait-il mettre les Institutions avant les compétences ou les compétences avant les Institutions?" Dans toutes les Constitutions, dans la plupart, en tout cas dans celles que je connais, on met les Institutions d'abord, et on met les compétences après. On a pensé que la construction européenne, compte tenu de sa nature, plusieurs d'entre vous l'ont dit, ne peut pas se doter d'une constitution qui serait celle d'un Etat existant qui organise ses pouvoirs. Il s'agit de la Constitution d'un ensemble de peuples et d'Etats – je dis volontiers de peuples et d'Etats – qui veulent organiser leur démarche et leur avenir. Le système est donc déterminé, en réalité, par les objectifs et par les compétences. C'est pourquoi nous avons pensé qu'il fallait mettre les objectifs – on en dira un mot – en tête, les compétences ensuite, et après les éléments plus institutionnels.

M. Folini, avec malice, s'est interrogé sur l'ordre dans lequel nous avons évoqué les institutions. Il n'y a aucune malice. C'est l'ordre qui résulte de la combinaison des traités de Maastricht et du traité de Rome. Dans le traité de Rome, qu'il faut relire, l'ordre est: Parlement, Conseil, Commission. Le Parlement, c'est un salut à la légitimité démocratique. Où fallait-il mettre le Conseil européen? Nous nous sommes reportés au traité de Maastricht, qui le met en tête, parce que c'est une institution qui doit donner une impulsion à l'ensemble. Il est donc normal qu'il figure en tête. C'est pour cela que nous avons pris comme ordre: Conseil européen, Parlement, Conseil, Commission.

Mme Tiilikainen nous a dit: "Mais il faut attendre pour la PESC les travaux qui sont en cours, les travaux du groupe de Michel Barnier". Bien entendu. Nous disons simplement que si on arrive à des propositions, voilà où ces propositions figureront dans le traité constitutionnel. D'ailleurs le traité de Maastricht prévoit qu'il doit y avoir une politique commune de défense et qu'elle doit aller vers un système européen. Ce n'est donc pas non plus quelque chose qu'on introduit, mais quelque chose qu'on met en mouvement. Nous attendons de voir où il conviendra de le faire figurer.

M. Brok avait insisté pour que les questions de pouvoir figurent dans la partie constitutionnelle. Il a tout à fait raison. Nous sommes de cet avis. Il peut y avoir des points de procédure, de procédure pure. Et il faudra voir où les inscrire. Mais je crois d'abord que les procédures peuvent être simplifiées. Je pense aux deux grands articles qui décrivent la "navette" au sein de la procédure de codécision, articles qui sont d'une rédaction compliquée, ce qui avait d'ailleurs été signalé par Giuliano Amato. Mais je crois que ces articles pouvant être simplifiés, ils auraient leur place, eux aussi, dans la première partie. Parce que la procédure législative, dans la plupart des grandes démocraties, c'est un ensemble de la vie institutionnelle du pays.

M. Fayot a posé la question des titres 1 et 2, demandant s'ils ne pourraient pas être plus centrés sur les citoyens. Nous avons, en fait, des complications concernant ce passage, parce qu'on nous a demandé qu'il y ait un préambule à la constitution. Il y a toujours un préambule à la constitution. C'est en général un texte assez court, de l'ordre d'une page, une page et demie. Mais il y a également le préambule de la Charte. Ensuite, il y a deux définitions possibles des droits. Il y a la définition dans la constitution et il y a la définition donnée par la Charte. Il faut arriver à ce que tout ceci soit assez clair, qu'il n'y ait pas de redite, et il faut donc qu'il y ait un préambule pour la constitution, un article intitulé "création du système politique, de l'entité politique", et ensuite, vous avez raison, des titres centrés sur les citoyens, mais en essayant de faire une synthèse, ou en tout cas de regrouper les dispositions concernant les droits des citoyens.

M. Frenco a salué la référence au principe de solidarité. Je n'ai pas voulu vous proposer trop de choses, parce qu'il faut laisser la spontanéité de la Convention, et lui laisser le temps, le loisir de s'épanouir elle-même. Mais j'avais réfléchi à une devise pour l'Union et je l'avais proposée au praesidium, qui avait répondu: "pas de devise, on verra plus tard". La devise à laquelle j'avais pensé était: "liberté, justice et solidarité". Parce que je crois que si on prend le système tel qu'on l'imagine, et ne peut pas mettre beaucoup plus de mots dans une devise. Je pense que la solidarité est un des points centraux, à la fois de la société européenne et en même temps des relations possibles de l'Union européenne avec le reste du monde.

Mme McAvan s'est préoccupée de la citoyenneté, mais elle existe déjà. Elle est dans les traités. Je crois que nous devons la mettre à un endroit qui est important pour l'opinion publique, parce que la citoyenneté est un droit, elle est porteur de droits, ces droits doivent être énumérés dans la constitution, comme c'est le cas dans toutes les constitutions. En réalité, on ne propose pas de droits nouveaux, puisqu'ils sont déjà énumérés dans les différents traités, mais on les regroupe avec une certaine solennité, de façon à ce que les citoyens européens, qui restent des citoyens nationaux, sachent quelle est la panoplie de droits qu'ils peuvent exercer à ce titre.

Mme Hjelm-Wallén a posé la question de la défense et de savoir s'il fallait mettre en place un dispositif spécial pour les affaires étrangères, pour la diplomatie et pour la défense. Je pose une question très simple à tous les représentants nommés par les gouvernements, qui sont ici, les 28: Y a-t-il un seul pays dans lequel c'est la même personne qui est chargée des politiques étrangère et de la défense? Je n'en connais pas, parce que ce sont des problèmes spécifiques. Le problème de la défense, et on attendra les rapports du groupe de M. Barnier, porteront très vraisemblablement sur des problèmes assez techniques de la défense, c'est-à-dire une agence pour l'acquisition et la normalisation des armements, la mise en place de certaines structures communes. Je crois qu'il est normal, au moins à ce stade de nos travaux, que nous ayons une rubrique pour les Affaires étrangères et une rubrique pour la défense.

Monsieur Moscovici, vous avez eu le courage rare de vous amuser sur l'appellation de l'Union. Cela veut dire deux choses: la première est que, à partir du moment où nous fusionnons les traités, il n'y a plus de nom, puisque nous avons à la fois la Communauté européenne et l'Union. De toute façon, il faut choisir. On ne va pas l'appeler la Communauté-Union européenne. Il n'y a plus de nom. Il faut en choisir un. S'il faut en choisir un, il faut le faire librement, ouvertement. Il faut consulter les citoyens. Il faut regarder de quoi les mots seront porteurs, non pas actuellement, mais dans dix ans, dans vingt ans. Quand, dans vingt ans, les jeunes parleront de l'Europe dans une réunion internationale, préféreront-ils dire l'Union, ou l'Europe? Il faut regarder, écouter. La Convention n'a pas été consultée, donc on ne tranche rien. Mais je vous demande de vous mettre à l'écoute des citoyens et des citoyennes et de vous dire: quand on choisit un nom – c'est vrai pour une compagnie, pour un produit – il faut choisir un nom qui soit porteur d'images pour le système. Quel est le nom qui sera porteur d'images pour l'Europe? Non pas aujourd'hui, bien sûr, mais dans dix ou vingt ans.

Vous avez fait quelques remarques sur le contenu, mais vous avez dit vous-même que nous renvoyons la discussion, sur le contenu, aux différents retours de nos groupes de travail.

J'en viens à la question de M. Duff. Nous en avons parlé et je voudrais que vous vous imprégniez de l'idée que notre convention est une structure libérale. On ne cherche pas à imposer des méthodes, des contraintes. Un débat prolongé sur l'architecture ne serait probablement pas très productif actuellement. Vous avez fait vos remarques, il reste d'autres remarques à faire. Elles seront donc faites le 8 novembre au matin, et nous aurons vos réactions sur l'architecture. Ce qui sera important, comme d'autres l'ont dit, c'est ensuite la relation entre l'architecture et la substance. Et quand on verra arriver la substance à la suite du retour des travaux des groupes de travail – j'en cite quelques-uns: le groupe de travail sur la simplification, qui va apporter des éléments très importants sur le fonctionnement institutionnel, le groupe de travail de Jean-Luc Dehaene sur la présence internationale de l'Union, qui va aussi apporter des éléments importants –, c'est à ce moment-là qu'on verra si l'architecture proposée est la bonne ou s'il y a des modifications, des améliorations à apporter.

Il me semble – mais ceci n'est pas dogmatique et on en reparlera – que nous allons terminer ce débat le 8 novembre. Ensuite, dans nos sessions suivantes, nous allons avoir le retour des travaux des groupes de travail. Il faudra accueillir ces travaux, y compris ceux, très importants, sur la gouvernance économique et sociale qui, du point de vue du fonctionnement de l'Union, a une importance considérable. Ayant reçu ces travaux, en ayant débattu, nous serons amenés probablement à vous présenter un nouveau schéma. Ce schéma pourra-t-il être beaucoup plus détaillé? Se contentera-t-il d'incorporer les éléments qui auront été décidés jusqu'ici, comme par exemple la subsidiarité, la Charte, l'unicité juridique? Nous le verrons. Mais je pense que c'est au début de l'année 2003 qu'on devrait passer de l'avant-projet d'architecture à un projet d'architecture, à quelque chose de plus descriptif. Et ensuite nous aborderons bien sûr les différents sujets que vous avez déjà évoqués vous-mêmes. Je pense que pour les questions institutionnelles, je vous le dis franchement, il faudra les débattre en séance plénière. Je crois que c'est difficile de faire des groupes de travail, parce que les groupes de travail ne seront pas nécessairement représentatifs. D'autre part, ils peuvent céder à la tentation qu'iront dans les groupes de travail ceux qui sont en faveur du rôle particulier d'une institution ou d'une autre, et donc il me semble que les grandes questions institutionnelles devront être débattues en séance plénière. Par contre, il y aura certainement ensuite des points techniques, c'est-à-dire que lorsqu'on aura à trancher, vu un certain nombre de problèmes institutionnels, certaines modalités particulières concernant des désignations, certains fonctionnements, qui devront faire l'objet de travaux plus fouillés. Mais il ne s'agira pas de mettre en place des groupes de travail au sens global du terme. Ce seront plutôt des groupes d'expertise composés des membres de la Convention qui s'intéresseront à un problème particulier.

Voilà, Monsieur Duff – je ne sais pas si j'ai bien répondu à votre demande –, comment nous imaginons à l'heure actuelle la poursuite de nos travaux.

Je vous remercie.

(Applaudissements)

Nous nous retrouverons donc les jeudi 7 et vendredi 8 novembre. Pour ce qui est du jeudi 7: groupe de travail sur les compétences complémentaires, M. Christophersen, et sur la gouvernance économique et sociale, M. Hänsch. Le lendemain, poursuite des travaux sur l'architecture pour ceux auxquels nous n'avons pas pu donner la parole.

THE SECRETARIAT

Brussels, 11 March 2003 (12.03)*(OR. en,fr)*CONV 601/03*NOTE

---

Subject : Summary report on the plenary session <sup>1</sup>
– Brussels, 27 and 28 February 2003

I. Debate on the amendments to Articles 1 to 4 of the draft Constitution*Article 1

1. Chairman Giscard d'Estaing presented the amendments received, pointing out that, unsurprisingly, Article 1 and Article 2 had given rise to many amendment proposals. Article 1 is the article which defines the Union and is the foundation of the whole construction. The Chairman reminded the meeting that the Treaty is establishing a constitution. The substance of the text under discussion is a constitution, but one which takes the legal form of a treaty since, in contrast to a national constitution, the powers conferred on the Union derive from the States which conclude the Treaty. The Chairman stated that the Praesidium was willing to clarify this point by means of more appropriate wording if the Convention so wished. However, given that Article 1 was already an integral part of the constitution, it was not necessary to mention the High Contracting Parties again in that article, since they would appear in the preamble.
2. As regards the actual definition of the nature of the Union, the Chairman pointed out that a large number of Convention members found it too weak, while an equal if not larger number were opposed to the term "federal".

<http://european-convention.eu.int>

Article 4

8. The debate confirmed that there was broad consensus on this provision giving legal personality to the Union.

II. Debate on the amendments to Articles 5 to 7 of the draft Constitution

Article 5

9. Vice-Chairman Dehaene introduced the debate on this article by underlining that the Praesidium had attempted to express, in a single provision, the two elements of the consensus that had been reached, i.e. the integration of the Charter into the Constitution and a clause allowing the Union to accede to the European Convention on Human Rights.
10. The debate confirmed that there was broad agreement on these two elements. Moreover, a large number of speakers expressed their preference for either inserting the Charter into the first part of the Constitution (which they argued would facilitate the wording of Articles 2 and 3 or – and this second alternative was acceptable only as a compromise solution to some members - establishing that the Charter constituted a second part of the Constitution, to be inserted between the first part and the part on the Union's policies. Some members supported including the text of the Charter as a protocol. Others emphasised the importance of the amendments to the wording of the Charter suggested by Working Group II and of completing the "Explanations" on the Charter drawn up by the Praesidium of the previous Convention.
11. Various speakers wanted paragraph 2 strengthened by laying down an obligation for the Union to apply for accession to the ECHR, with a view to minimising the risk of accession being blocked under the unanimity rule. Some speakers also called for mention to be made in this paragraph of possible accession to other international conventions on human rights.

Articles 6 and 7

12. In presenting the amendments made to the draft wording of Article 6, and also in relation to Article 7, Vice-Chairman Dehaene highlighted the major question of whether – and to what extent – these provisions overlapped with those of the Charter. He explained that the Praesidium had nonetheless considered it appropriate to include these provisions on non-discrimination and citizens' rights in the first part, in view of their overriding importance. He also pointed out that, with its draft Article 6, the Praesidium wished to confirm exactly how the law stood at present.
13. The question of overlapping was at the heart of the debate, and a number of speakers argued that if the Charter was integrated into the first part or into a new part 2, then the current Article 6 could be deleted and Article 7 could be considerably shortened since it would no longer have to list citizens' rights. Others favoured keeping such a list. Some speakers observed that, in addition to the articles in the Charter, it would be necessary in any event to establish the necessary legal bases by incorporating those of Articles 12, 13 and 18 to 22 TEC, which could be done in the part of the Constitution on policies.
14. In relation to Article 6, a number of speakers called for the prohibition to be extended to other forms of discrimination.

III. Presentation of draft Articles 24 et seq. on the instruments

15. The President underlined that in drawing up its draft for Title V, the Praesidium had kept in view the important objective of simplification as set out in the Laeken declaration. It had based its drafting on the results of the Working Group, as well as the debate in plenary on this issue.

Le Président.- Chers conventionnels, personne ne comprendrait, je crois, que nous reprenions les délibérations de la Convention sur l'avenir de l'Europe sans prendre en compte l'aggravation de la situation internationale et les divisions qu'elle provoque au sein de l'Union européenne.

La crise concernant l'Irak et les débats au Conseil européen ainsi qu'au Conseil de sécurité font peser une ombre et une angoisse sur nos travaux. Aussi loin que l'on remonte en arrière, jusqu'à la période autrement périlleuse de la guerre froide, on ne trouve l'exemple d'une Europe qui affiche aussi ouvertement ses désaccords sur la scène internationale. Quelle est la responsabilité qui nous incombe en tant que membres de cette Convention?

D'abord, me semble-t-il, nous devons demeurer l'enceinte où se retrouvent celles et ceux qui entendent répondre à l'aspiration majoritaire des peuples d'Europe qui demandent à ce qu'un jour l'Europe réussisse à s'exprimer d'une seule voix. Ensuite, la responsabilité est de constater que les textes et les structures institutionnelles, même les mieux conçus, ne sont pas utiles s'il n'existe pas la détermination de les utiliser. Les engagements de Maastricht en matière de politique étrangère et de sécurité commune ont été pris de bonne foi. Or, nous sommes aujourd'hui, treize ans plus tard, bien en arrière des engagements du Traité de l'Union européenne. Si ces engagements avaient été respectés, si des discussions approfondies s'étaient déroulées avant que des positions ne soient prises en public, s'il avait existé une volonté de tous de rechercher des positions communes, bref, si le réflexe européen avait joué, peut-être l'Europe aurait-elle pu exercer un rôle décisif. Le résultat n'était pas certain car il existait de réelles divergences de vues enracinées dans des souvenirs historiques mais cet effort valait la peine d'être tenté.

Ne nous faisons donc pas d'illusions. Améliorer les structures mises en place à Maastricht ne sera pas suffisant pour donner à l'Union européenne une voix plus forte et plus unie sur la scène internationale. Sans la volonté politique de tous, sans la réaction instinctive de consulter d'abord ses partenaires européens, sans le rétablissement de la confiance mutuelle aujourd'hui ébranlée, les structures n'auront guère d'efficacité. Mais notre responsabilité à nous, les conventionnels de l'an 2003, c'est d'accomplir la mission pour laquelle la Convention a été créée. Nous ne devons pas nous permettre de nous distraire de notre travail ou, au pire, de nous laisser aller à la résignation. Avec les neuf articles nouveaux et les deux protocoles que nous présenterons demain, nous avons déjà beaucoup accompli. En ce qui concerne la personnalité juridique unique de l'Union, la Charte, la clarification des compétences et la simplification des procédures, le rôle plus étendu, reconnu aux Parlements nationaux, les demandes du Traité de Nice sont pratiquement déjà réalisées. Maintenons donc le rythme de notre travail et augmentons-le si nécessaire, pour traduire, dans une langue simple et vigoureuse, les points d'accord explicites ou implicites qui ont émergé de vos débats et de vos contributions. Souvenons-nous également qu'une crise peut avoir un effet salutaire. Le Conseil européen est né dans la décennie 70 de la secousse créée par le premier choc pétrolier avec le Moyen-Orient en flammes et le terrorisme qui secouait les rues de nos villes d'Europe. Peut-être les événements qui risquent de se dérouler bientôt vont-ils déclencher une prise de conscience positive de l'intérêt commun des Européens. C'est pourquoi nous devons étudier et proposer le schéma institutionnel qui devrait permettre un jour, qui n'est pas aujourd'hui, de mettre en place un mécanisme d'incitation permettant aux dirigeants européens de progresser en direction d'une diplomatie commune. Et, après tout, ne nous laissons pas abattre si la montée devient plus rude, car c'est toujours l'Europe qui nous attend au bout du chemin.

Je vous suggère donc que nous en venions à notre travail d'aujourd'hui. Nous franchissons, en effet, une nouvelle étape d'élaboration du Traité constitutionnel. Nous allons débattre d'un premier groupe d'articles : ceux qui définissent l'Union, ses valeurs, ses objectifs et ses compétences. Nous n'avons pas été surpris, et vous ne l'avez pas été non plus j'imagine, par le grand nombre de propositions, de commentaires et d'amendements que les membres de la Convention ont transmis au sujet de ces articles. 1187 amendements au total, donc 435 sur les trois premiers articles, ce qui ne laisse même pas la place à cette tribune à ma tortue favorite. Ces articles constituent la première fondation de notre construction. Et je vous dirai franchement que je ne suis pas du tout choqué par le nombre d'amendements et de propositions d'autant plus, d'ailleurs, que beaucoup d'entre eux se recoupent ou se contredisent. Et il est normal que chacun souhaite contribuer. C'est dans cet esprit et pour assurer la pleine transparence de notre débat, que toutes les propositions à tous les commentaires ont été diffusés sur le site Internet. Le secrétariat, que je remercie, a établi une note d'analyse et de synthèse de ces propositions, parfois incomplète ou incorrecte à cause du nombre important de commentaires reçus et du délai imparti pour ce travail.

Comment allons-nous procéder ? Le praesidium souhaite que vous puissiez vous exprimer sur le projet d'articles. Mais vous êtes très nombreux à vouloir le faire. En outre, ce type d'expression n'est pas celui d'un discours mais celui d'un commentaire d'une proposition ou d'un amendement. C'est pour cette raison que nous vous demandons de réduire la durée de vos interventions d'aujourd'hui et de demain à deux minutes pour défendre un point de vue ou expliciter une proposition. En même temps, cela nous permettra d'accorder beaucoup plus souvent la parole à un carton bleu de façon à avoir un débat plus animé. Vous avez constaté que les propositions ne vont pas toutes dans le même sens. Peut-être que l'instinct, au départ, est de s'imaginer qu'il s'agit d'un dialogue entre le praesidium et les conventionnels. En réalité, les idées que vous exprimez sont souvent en contradiction avec les idées des autres. Ce qui est parfaitement normal. Il faut donc que vous expliquiez vos positions et que chacun écoute les explications des autres. La présidence vous écouterait mais il faut aussi vous écouter les uns et les autres.

Etant donné le nombre d'interventions et de documents, il est difficile d'épuiser l'examen d'un projet de texte uniquement lors des sessions actuellement prévues. C'est pourquoi nous vous proposons de poursuivre et d'approfondir cet examen par des sessions supplémentaires qui viendront s'intercaler entre les sessions plénières. Les deux premières se tiendront l'une le 5 mars et l'autre le 26 mars, toujours dans les locaux du Parlement européen que je remercie pour son hospitalité. Ces deux sessions prolongeront, comme il est vraisemblable, nos débats d'aujourd'hui et de demain.

On vous a annoncé que nous allions débattre d'abord des questions liées aux articles 1 à 4. J'introduirai cette partie. Ensuite, nous discuterons des questions relatives aux articles 4 à 7. Le vice-président Jean-Luc Dehaene introduira cette discussion. Demain matin, nous discuterons des articles sur les compétences. Le vice-président Amato conduira ce débat. Au début de chaque discussion, nous vous ferons une intervention, aussi brève que possible, qui vous donnera les arguments qui ont conduit le praesidium dans l'élaboration de son projet et qui, en même temps, identifiera les points essentiels, les questions principales qui ressortent de vos amendements et qu'il conviendrait d'approfondir.

Demain matin, avant le débat sur les articles concernant les compétences, je vous présenterai une deuxième section de textes. Il s'agit du projet d'article 24 et suivants sur les instruments, ainsi que deux protocoles importants, dans leur forme désormais achevée ou en tout cas proche de l'achèvement, sur la subsidiarité et sur le rôle des parlements nationaux. Le praesidium entend, comme je vous l'avais annoncé au mois de décembre, remplir son engagement, à savoir vous permettre de disposer d'un avant-projet complet de textes pour la fin du mois d'avril.

Comment vont se passer nos prochaines réunions? La session des 17 et 18 mars serait consacrée à l'examen des textes que je vais vous présenter demain matin. En outre, vous auriez à cette même session, la présentation des textes concernant le titre 7 sur les finances de l'Union, les articles tant de la partie 1 que de la partie 2 sur l'espace de liberté, de sécurité et de justice ainsi que le document de base, pour la deuxième partie - politiques de l'Union-, résultant du travail des experts des services juridiques, document très important et évidemment lourd à manier. Lors de la session des 3 et 4 avril, vous auriez la présentation de l'article du titre 9 qui concerne les rapports de l'Union et de son environnement proche. Vous auriez de nouvelles dispositions pour l'insertion dans le Traité de la méthode ouverte de coordination et, enfin, une première proposition de la partie 3 du Traité contenant les dispositions générales et finales. Pour ce qui est des institutions et de la vie démocratique de l'Union, les projets de texte pour les titres 4 et 6 de la partie 1 seront diffusés avant la session des 24 et 25 avril, entre le 10 et cette période, de façon à ce que vous puissiez avoir un premier échange de vues sur les institutions et la vie démocratique de l'Union au cours de la session des 24 et 25 avril. La deuxième partie, qui aura fait l'objet d'une première présentation - présentation des politiques de l'Union -, ainsi que la première partie révisée, c'est-à-dire dans son état de quasi-achèvement, vous seront présentées dans la première quinzaine du mois de mai. Il faut, en effet, nous assurer que nous aurons suffisamment de temps entre cette présentation et le Conseil européen de juin. En effet, vous ne pourrez porter de jugement sur l'ensemble du projet que lorsque vous verrez les rapports, les relations des parties entre elles. Vous ne pouvez pas porter ce jugement section par section. Il faudra donc que chaque conventionnel puisse avoir une vue d'ensemble du projet avant d'en faire une évaluation définitive.

J'espère vous avoir apporté, avec ces indications, une réponse à votre attente légitime et normale de connaître à l'avance l'organisation de nos travaux et votre envie de vous engager à fond dans notre projet commun. Toutes ces indications figurent d'ailleurs dans un document qui sera diffusé dans notre salle.

J'ai une demande de parole de M. Bonde. Je vous en prie. <BRK>

Bonde (PE). – The deadlines for amendments are too short. We cannot prepare them with those who support us. Two minutes is not enough time to discuss the entire first part of the draft constitution. We need to discuss the details in working groups and to have more meetings, as you have already suggested. Why not move the June deadline and schedule meetings until Christmas? It is not practical for us to receive the new dates so late. The four non-represented political families have a special problem. We asked for access to documents but have not yet received an answer. That is in breach of Community rules. The Community rules on transparency also cover the Praesidium. We insist on equality among Members in regard to access to information from the Praesidium. This will also help us to prepare the amendments. <BRK>

Le Président. – Sur toute cette affaire, nous sommes pris entre deux demandes contraires et il faudrait que les uns s'adressent aux autres. Nous avons les demandes du Conseil européen, c'est-à-dire des gouvernements, qui nous demandent avec insistance de terminer pour la fin du mois de juin. Et ils le répètent, je prends à témoin ceux d'entre vous qui siègent au Conseil européen. En sens inverse, naturellement, il y a le désir, que je comprends très bien, de disposer de délais plus longs. Mais il faut choisir. D'une part, nous avançons, comme vous l'avez vu, la publication de nos textes. Nous essaierons que vous ayez entre la publication des textes et le dépôt final des amendements un délai de l'ordre de deux semaines. Si l'on pense qu'il va y avoir plusieurs sessions répétitives, nous ne pouvons pas aller plus loin dans cette durée. Ou alors, adressez-vous aux gouvernements afin qu'au Conseil européen du mois de mars, ils modifient éventuellement le calendrier qu'ils proposent. Mais, à l'intérieur de ce calendrier, nous faisons le maximum, je prends à témoin les membres du secrétariat, pour que vous disposiez du délai nécessaire pour déposer vos amendements. D'ailleurs, la pile qui est là montre malgré tout, que nos pratiques n'ont pas été, semble-t-il, très restrictives. On essaiera de faire en sorte que vous ayez au total deux semaines. Mais nous ne pouvons pas aller plus loin ou alors il faudrait reporter officiellement la date d'achèvement de nos travaux.

Je m'excuse, je ne voudrais pas vous donner le sentiment que je monopolise la parole. On va aborder maintenant les premiers articles. Je voudrais vous dire le contenu des amendements et comment on va les discuter. On les a regroupés parce qu'en fait, il y a des parentés entre ces articles 1 à 3 -définition de l'Union, valeur de l'Union et objectifs de l'Union-. Et d'ailleurs, certains amendements portent tantôt sur l'un, tantôt sur l'autre, mais avec la même optique.

Je vous rappelle que le texte que nous préparons est un Traité qui institue une Constitution. Cela veut donc dire que le contenu de notre texte est une Constitution mais que cette Constitution prend la forme d'un Traité. En effet, les pouvoirs que nous voulons attribuer à l'Union dérivent des Etats qui concluent le Traité. C'est ce qui apparaît déjà au premier article. Dans le premier article, nous sommes déjà dans la Constitution. Certains d'entre vous disent dans leurs amendements qu'il faudrait mentionner les hautes parties contractantes. Non. On les mentionnera au préalable, dans le préambule.

Un autre point qui a provoqué beaucoup d'amendements que certains d'entre vous vont défendre, qui sont d'ailleurs contradictoires, est la définition même de la nature de l'Union. Certains considèrent que notre définition est trop timide, d'autres s'opposent au terme fédéral. Il faut savoir de toutes façons que l'entité de l'Union européenne est une entité unique. Elle n'est pas décrite dans les manuels de droit public par une définition classique. Pour certains, on voudrait y voir une enceinte de coordination et de concertation, mais ce n'est pas seulement cela. Elle est caractérisée par le fait que le transfert des compétences des Etats membres à l'Union se traduit dans une gestion de ses compétences qui est en fait du mode fédéral. Et il n'y a pas de différence, par exemple, entre la gestion de l'euro et la gestion du dollar si vous prenez le système de gestion de l'une ou de l'autre, ces deux systèmes de gestion étant du mode fédéral. C'est donc le mode de gestion qui est fédéral, sans que l'Union soit pour autant une fédération accomplie. Vous avez une série d'amendements qui disent une chose ou qui, au contraire, préfèrent l'écarter. Le mode fédéral, et je l'indique à ceux qui s'alarment de ce mot, ne se réfère qu'à certaines des compétences attribuées à l'Union. Et par contre, qu'on le dise ou non, ces compétences sont exercées sur le mode fédéral.

Un autre point important dans vos amendements concerne le fait que dans notre Constitution, les compétences attribuées à l'Union ne puissent dériver que des Etats membres. Nous le disons clairement mais plusieurs amendements montrent que sans doute, notre texte n'est pas suffisamment explicite et qu'on peut le rendre plus explicite.

Il y a une question qui est de savoir si nous bâtissons une Union stable, c'est-à-dire un système qui aura son propre équilibre et naturellement qui évoluera dans le temps ou si nous restons dans une démarche. C'est la question soulevée par les amendements qui portent sur l'expression "Union sans cesse plus étroite". C'était une conception d'origine de la construction européenne, quand il n'y avait pas d'Union et qu'on voulait donc qu'elle devienne sans cesse plus étroite. A partir du moment où nous définissons l'Union, ses compétences, son mode de fonctionnement, il faut savoir si nous souhaitons un ensemble stable, au moins pendant une certaine période, ou un ensemble qui soit en évolution. C'est là un point sur lequel il y a des amendements.

Enfin, il y a des propositions concernant le respect de l'identité nationale. Il faut voir aussi que dans notre article 1, on trouve simplement une affirmation très courte: le respect de l'identité nationale. C'est plus tard, dans les compétences etc., qu'on indiquera ou qu'on indique la manière ou les objets de l'identité nationale qui doivent faire l'objet de ce respect. Dans certains amendements, on propose de le mettre dès le premier article. Cela ferait un premier article assez lourd. Nous, nous l'avons mis dans l'article 9, paragraphe 6, point qui devra être discuté.

Certains d'entre vous se sont exprimés à propos du nom à donner à l'Union européenne. Nous n'interviendrons pas sur ce sujet. Nous le laisserons ouvert jusqu'à la fin de nos travaux en essayant de savoir si l'opinion publique, dans ce domaine, exprime ou non une préférence.

Je vais dire quelques mots sur l'article 2 et sur l'article 3. Il faut bien comprendre ce qu'est l'article 2. Notre membre du praesidium, Monsieur António Vitorino, qui est là, aurait pu donner cette indication mais je vais la donner à sa place. L'article 2 est la définition et le contenu des valeurs de l'Union. On peut faire un catalogue plus ou moins long de ces valeurs. Il faut savoir que plus on l'allonge dans une certaine mesure, plus on l'affaiblit parce que l'addition, l'énumération affaiblissent un peu la portée du texte. Mais surtout, cet article, doit être lu en association avec l'article 45 de la Constitution qui établit la procédure pour la suspension des droits d'appartenir à l'Union en cas de violation des principes et des valeurs de l'Union de la part d'un Etat membre. Vous vous rappelez qu'un article avait été introduit dans le Traité antérieur, à la suite des incertitudes politiques dans tel ou tel Etat membre. Il portait le numéro 7 à l'époque. Donc, on ne peut mettre dans cet article 2 que des valeurs qui sont définies juridiquement de façon suffisamment solide pour pouvoir permettre l'engagement de procédures contre les Etats membres qui ne les respecteraient pas. On ne peut donc pas mettre des valeurs indicatives ou respectables mais de caractère plus émotif que juridique telles que, par exemple, l'égalité ou la solidarité. En effet, on ne voit pas bien une action juridique déclenchée vis-à-vis d'un Etat de l'Union à propos de la violation de telle ou telle de ces valeurs. Si on les mettait dans cette partie, on fragiliserait en tout cas, l'article 45 de la Constitution, parce qu'on le rendrait en réalité peu applicable. Néanmoins, certaines valeurs ont été proposées par vous comme on va l'entendre. Il y a la notion d'égalité, égalité qui est tantôt toute seule, tantôt l'égalité entre hommes et femmes, la transparence, la référence ou non à des identités nationales et régionales.

Un second type de débat concerne l'éventuelle introduction d'une référence au fait religieux ou au patrimoine religieux, qualifié par les uns de patrimoine religieux, par les autres de référence chrétienne ou de patrimoine chrétien. Il convient que vous en discutiez. C'est un sujet parmi les sujets importants de la Convention et il doit donc être traité au grand jour. Il y a des amendements sur ce point. Ces amendements devront faire normalement l'objet d'un débat. Je vous indique simplement pourquoi nous ne l'avons pas mis au départ dans notre texte. C'est parce qu'il y a trois sujets à traiter sous cet angle. Il y a un sujet qui est la déclaration sur le respect du statut des Eglises et des associations religieuses et non conventionnelles qui figure dans le Traité d'Amsterdam et que nous reprendrons dans notre propre Traité. Ce n'est donc pas dans les premiers articles que cette proposition vous sera faite. Il y a ensuite la question de savoir si dans le préambule de la Constitution, comme on l'avait envisagé à l'époque dans le préambule de la Charte des droits fondamentaux, il y a une référence, et laquelle, au patrimoine religieux de l'Union européenne. Nous vous proposerons une disposition dans ce texte, c'est-à-dire dans le préambule. Par contre, nous n'avons pas pensé que cette référence était à sa place dans l'article 2 pour les raisons que j'ai données tout à l'heure. Il était difficile d'en faire éventuellement le sujet d'un contentieux politique ou juridique dans l'Union. Mais, là aussi, je souhaite vivement que vous vous exprimiez et que vous donniez vos opinions. D'ailleurs, il y a eu des amendements assez nombreux à ce sujet et même encore tout à fait récemment.

Concernant l'article 3, il ne faut pas se tromper. C'est un article sur les grands objectifs de l'Union, en termes généraux et de manière horizontale. Ce n'est pas la description des politiques de l'Union, qui sont décrites dans la deuxième partie de la Constitution. C'est pour permettre au citoyen de répondre à la question qu'il se pose sûrement, et qui est "l'Europe, pourquoi la fait-on, pourquoi la crée-t-on, pourquoi faire?". C'est donc la définition, l'indication des objectifs poursuivis par l'Union. Et donc, lorsque vous aurez à examiner les politiques de l'Union avec la deuxième partie, vous verrez s'il y a lieu de compléter ou non ces objectifs. En tout cas, il faut avoir les deux en tête. Dans vos amendements, on a l'impression que vous avez bien accepté cette notion. Vous ne cherchez pas à mettre dans cet article la description des politiques de l'Union. Et il y a seulement quelques amendements qui veulent aller plus loin et d'autres d'ailleurs, qui veulent supprimer le premier paragraphe de cet article, de façon assez singulière, parce qu'il s'agit de la proposition que l'Union assure la promotion dans le monde des valeurs de paix, de bien-être etc. Nous ne pourrions pas mettre dans cet article tous les éléments envisagés par les uns ou par les autres. D'ailleurs, ils se recouvrent souvent. Je vous cite simplement les groupes de questions sur lesquelles il est probable que vous allez vous exprimer. Il y a, par exemple, l'objectif de la protection de l'environnement. Dans notre texte, nous parlons déjà de développement durable. Certains d'entre vous pensent que ce n'est pas suffisant. Il y a également deux groupes qui ne disent pas tout à fait la même chose. D'un côté, on trouve ceux qui voudraient qu'on se réfère à l'économie sociale de marché et de l'autre, ceux qui voudraient qu'on se réfère au modèle social européen. Il y a également une série d'amendements qui rouvrent un débat sur la question de savoir ce qu'on met concernant l'emploi. Certains amendements souhaitent que l'on mette une notion de plein emploi et d'autres souhaitent que ce soit un haut niveau d'emploi pour tenir compte de certaines critiques qui se sont exprimées à propos du réalisme éventuel de nos ambitions. Il y a également une demande sur ce qu'on peut dire ou non en matière de cohésion territoriale afin de savoir si celle-ci est couverte par la cohésion économique et sociale ou s'il faut ajouter une notion différente de la cohésion territoriale. Il y a, enfin, des demandes concernant la diversité linguistique qui s'expriment de façon différente. En effet, la diversité linguistique n'est pas en soi un objectif de l'Union. Il s'agit plutôt de savoir comment l'Union traite la diversité linguistique et quelle est son attitude à cet égard.

Je crois que c'est l'essentiel. A la fin, certains amendements, ceux qui sont sous le bas de la pile, visent à ce que ces valeurs soient avancées dans le monde. Toutefois, la Constitution est la Constitution de l'Union européenne. L'Union européenne manifeste ses valeurs. Elle peut ensuite, et ce sera là un sujet d'intérêt, voir comment elle peut assurer leur promotion dans le monde. Toutefois, elle n'est pas en situation, naturellement, d'imposer ou même de proposer en tant que telles, ses valeurs dans le monde.

Ce sont là les points forts de vos amendements. Ils se regroupent dans cette pile. Nous allons essayer de vous écouter dans l'ordre où vous vous êtes inscrits.

Il y a eu un changement d'ordre. Nous nous occupons des articles 1 à 3. Le temps de parole est de deux minutes. Vous pouvez vous exprimer sur les trois articles ou sur l'un d'entre eux, suivant votre préférence personnelle. <BRK>

Zieleniec (Parl.-CZ). – As you mentioned, we have now entered the crucial stage of the Convention. After a long discussion we are starting to prepare the final text of the constitution. How we approach this task is very important. We look for consensus, a common view. We can describe the consensus and common view in two ways. First, we can put together all the various views and arguments to create a text which reflects everyone's views. Secondly, we can work by reduction, and look for more general views and texts that are simple and transparent. I am convinced that we should choose the second option.

Looking at the hundreds of pages we have here, we see a great number of proposals for additional words, for additional formulations. I should like to stress that if we adopt those proposals we will end up with a constitution made up of hundreds of pages and one that is difficult to understand and not transparent.

The first articles are extremely important from this point of view - articles about various end objectives. Taking the example of the discovery of space, why do we not also mention research in the fields of cancer or Aids? Why mention the rights of children, but not the rights of women or religious minorities? This is not the way to create the final text. I encourage the Praesidium to prepare the second draft by the method of reduction, rather than by making further additions. The shortest and simplest method is the best. <BRK>

Le Président. – Je vous remercie Monsieur Zieleniec. Vos remarques vont dans le sens du souhait que je forme moi-même sur la qualité et la concision du texte. L'orateur suivant est Monsieur Fayot, mais je crois qu'il a regroupé des temps de parole. Est-ce que je me trompe? Il faut une certaine souplesse dans nos débats. On peut donc envisager que plusieurs d'entre vous se groupent pour donner la parole à quelqu'un qui s'exprimerait un peu plus longtemps. Mais il faut naturellement qu'on le sache. Monsieur Fayot, vous avez donc la parole pour six minutes. <BRK>

Fayot (Parl.-LU). – Monsieur le Président, les conventionnels socialistes et sociaux-démocrates m'ont demandé de vous présenter une synthèse de certains éléments fondamentaux qui trouvent leur accord sur la base des nombreux amendements introduits. Je voudrais expliquer notre démarche. Il est certain que chaque grande famille politique a ses convergences et ses divergences, qui tiennent à la situation politique et historique de ses composantes. Il serait vain de les nier et de faire comme s'il y avait unanimité sur tout. Notre effort doit aller vers la synthèse pour autant que faire se peut. C'est ce que nous avons tenté de faire ensemble et c'est ce dont je vous fait rapport ici.

En ce qui concerne l'article 1, ce qui pose problème à certains d'entre nous, socialistes, c'est le terme de fédéral. Suivant les situations nationales et linguistiques, le mot comporte des connotations qui sont difficiles pour eux d'accepter. D'autres n'y voient pas de problème parce qu'en fait, cet adjectif recouvre la réalité actuelle. C'est donc avant tout une question de vocabulaire. Mais nous voyons aussi que la formulation du praesidium est descriptive par rapport à ce qu'est l'Union à l'heure actuelle. Dans ce qu'elle fait dès maintenant, il y a des éléments supranationaux, et nous parlons à ce propos de méthode communautaire. C'est ce qui fait l'originalité de l'Union européenne par rapport aux institutions internationales courantes. Les socialistes sont attachés à cette méthode communautaire dans les domaines que les traités ont définis jusqu'ici. Quant à savoir s'il faut étendre cette méthode communautaire, la question sera traitée ailleurs. Par conséquent, sur ce point, je pense qu'il convient d'exprimer dans ce premier article, le constat, sans plus.

Dans ce même article, se pose la question de savoir d'où viennent les compétences de l'Union. En d'autres termes, quel est le souverain? On comprend facilement le débat entre les tenants d'une coopération intergouvernementale et ceux qui voudraient aller plus loin dans l'intégration communautaire. Là encore, la Constitution fait un constat de ce qu'il y a à l'heure actuelle. Les compétences de l'Union viennent évidemment des Etats. Il est donc légitime de marquer cela dans cet article, comme on le fait. Mais nous savons aussi que nos citoyens et nos peuples constituent le fondement de la construction européenne. Nous voulons les impliquer dans cette construction. Nous leur demandons leur accord par référendum ou à travers le représentant élu. Contre eux, non plus, rien n'est possible. Il faut donc mentionner aussi la volonté des peuples d'Europe et des citoyens dans ce premier article pour légitimer notre Constitution.

Nous pensons aussi qu'il faut introduire une référence à la Charte des Nations Unies pour bien marquer que l'Union européenne s'inscrit dans les efforts d'une gouvernance mondiale, essentielle pour assurer la paix et la sécurité de tous les peuples.

Un point central de nos discussions a concerné les articles 2 et 3 sur les valeurs et les objectifs de l'Union. Beaucoup d'entre nous pensent que l'accord sur ce qu'il faut mettre dans ces deux articles serait plus facile à trouver s'il était clair que nous mettons la Charte des droits fondamentaux en tête de la Constitution. En effet, un grand nombre d'éléments de la Charte se retrouvent dans les deux articles comme dans les multiples amendements apportés - la dignité humaine, la solidarité, le respect des diversités, la justice etc -. Nous parlons bien sûr de la Charte avec les articles horizontaux tels qu'ils ont été élaborés, par consensus, dans le groupe de travail afférent et que la plénière a largement approuvés, tel qu'amendés. Ces articles horizontaux précisent clairement la portée de la Charte et confirment que celle-ci ne crée pas de nouvelles compétences pour l'Union. Toutefois, cela ne l'empêche pas d'exprimer le fondement de valeurs pour les activités de l'Union dans ses différents domaines de compétences, définis par ailleurs.

Les socialistes et les sociaux-démocrates considèrent comme essentiel que dans l'article 2 apparaisse également et clairement le principe de l'égalité des femmes et des hommes.

Nous considérons évidemment aussi la justice sociale comme une valeur fondamentale de nos sociétés européennes. L'article 3, paragraphe 2, dans la version proposée par le praesidium constitue une formulation intéressante qui marque l'équilibre général entre l'économique et le social dans le cadre du développement durable. On peut certes améliorer la formulation mais, l'essentiel est cet équilibre. Le texte est clair sur la nécessité de croissance et de compétitivité économique pour atteindre un niveau de vie élevé. Suite à l'accord obtenu au sein du groupe de travail sur la dimension sociale, nous voulons encore y introduire la notion d'économie sociale de marché. Nous saluons la notion de plein emploi retenue suite à l'accord obtenu au sein de ce groupe de travail. Il est bien de marquer clairement qu'il s'agit d'un but à atteindre. Il nous tient également à cœur de bien marquer dans cet article qu'il s'agit non seulement de protéger l'environnement mais encore de l'améliorer. Nous insistons aussi sur l'importance d'affirmer la cohésion territoriale des Etats membres.

Enfin, si nous saluons que le paragraphe 4 de l'article 3 marque bien notre responsabilité face au reste du monde, il est important d'insister sur la lutte contre la pauvreté et l'exclusion sociale dans l'Union européenne même. La même chose vaut pour la protection des droits des enfants. Nous soulignons aussi qu'au paragraphe 3, on parle de respect de la diversité culturelle. La culture est un élément important de l'identité de chaque Etat comme de chaque région. Nous savons qu'elle est, de ce fait, une compétence complémentaire et que personne ne veut aller au-delà. Mais la culture est aussi un élément qui permet d'unir au-delà des frontières et les socialistes sont en faveur de confirmer cela dans notre Constitution.

Voilà, Monsieur le Président, quelques lignes de force que les socialistes européens entendent poursuivre de façon offensive dans la rédaction de ces articles. <BRK>

Le Président. – Très franchement, Monsieur Fayot, je vous remercie du travail qui a été fait par vous-même et par vos amis parce que vous avez, en effet, regroupé un certain nombre d'éléments. Cela permet d'avoir une vue plus globale, plus synthétique de vos demandes. Quand vous dites que vous allez combattre, ce ne sera pas combattre. On va vous écouter sur beaucoup de points et je crois qu'il y a des éléments qui pourront, en effet, faire l'objet d'un dialogue constructif. Vous avez évoqué la question des rapports entre ce que nous disons là et le contenu de la Charte. Evidemment, ce n'est pas la peine de dire les choses deux fois. Vous dites que cela dépend de l'endroit où l'on mettra la Charte. C'est un peu vrai. Mais l'endroit où l'on mettra la Charte dépend aussi de l'architecture de lecture du texte. On dit que la Charte figure dans la deuxième partie. Lorsqu'on examinera l'article 5 sur les Droits fondamentaux, et je le dis à Jean-Luc puisque c'est lui qui présidera, je recommanderai de dire que la Charte constitue la deuxième partie. Elle en fait partie en sa substance. Faut-il, au point de vue de la présentation, la mettre en tête et donc faire que le lecteur soit obligé de parcourir toute la Charte avant d'arriver à l'examen des institutions et des compétences de l'Union ? C'est le seul problème. Mais il est évident qu'il faut avoir en tête le fait que la Charte constitue une partie du texte et que donc, il n'y a pas lieu de redire des choses qui sont bien formulées dans celle-ci.

Le prochain orateur est Monsieur Fini. <BRK>

Fini (Ch.E/G.-IT). - Signor Presidente, cercherò di essere rapidissimo - se riusciamo in due minuti a dire qualcosa di sensato su tre articoli entriamo quasi nel Guinness dei primati - perché mi rendo conto che abbiamo dei doveri di rispetto del nostro lavoro. Con molta rapidità dunque sui primi tre articoli: il governo italiano ha presentato degli emendamenti che hanno l'obiettivo di rafforzare, innanzitutto, dei concetti che ci sembrano emersi nei gruppi di lavoro e che sono quindi condivisi, in qualche modo, da buona parte dei membri della Convenzione. E' la ragione per la quale, nell'articolo 1, pensiamo che vada messo in evidenza che l'Unione ha la doppia legittimità, degli Stati e dei popoli: un'Unione di Stati nazionali, quindi, che esercitano in modo congiunto la sovranità in determinati settori. Questa è la ragione per la quale pensiamo che sia opportuno inserire di nuovo il riferimento all'Unione più stretta tra popoli e Stati, secondo quella dizione che è presente fin dai primi documenti della costruzione europea. Questa è anche la ragione per la quale pensiamo che vada superata la logica di conflitto che sussiste tra chi dice che occorre ribadire che il metodo è federale e chi, al contrario, pensa che occorra un'espressione diversa, quale può essere confederale. E' la ragione per la quale noi pensiamo che non sia opportuno usare né l'una né l'altra espressione, soprattutto perché poi tutta l'architettura istituzionale ha certamente un aspetto comunitario.

Rapidissimamente ora sull'articolo 2: condividiamo i valori e invitiamo a distinguere bene i valori dagli obiettivi. E' la ragione per la quale crediamo che l'ultimo capoverso dell'articolo 2 sia più opportuno inserirlo nell'articolo 3. Sui valori abbiamo presentato un emendamento che invita la Convenzione a rendere esplicito il riconoscimento delle radici di quella identità europea che, secondo noi, è anche nei valori della religione cristiana, nella sua tradizione giudaico-cristiana. Questo non vuol dire attentare alla laicità delle istituzioni; è la fotografia, secondo noi, di un'identità, di un dato di verità. I laici autentici credo che debbano innanzitutto saper riconoscere le identità profonde, e l'identità europea è un'identità - penso ad alcuni valori quali il primato della persona - che difficilmente può essere considerata scissa dalla tradizione religiosa. Questa è la ragione per la quale il mio governo ha presentato un emendamento in questo senso all'articolo 2.

Mi fermo qui perché ho già impiegato due minuti e cinquantadue secondi: non entro nel Guinness dei primati, mi dispiace. <BRK>

Teufel (Parl.-DE). - Herr Präsident, liebe Kolleginnen und Kollegen! Die vom Präsidium vorgelegten Artikelentwürfe sind eine bemerkenswerte Grundlage für unsere Arbeit. Lassen Sie mich zunächst zwei Bemerkungen zur Gesamtheit der Artikel machen. Erstens, das Sekretariat hat uns die Fülle der eingereichten Änderungsvorschläge vorgelegt. Wir dürfen aber nicht übersehen, dass es zugleich viel Zustimmung gibt. Wenn zu einem Artikel zehn Änderungsvorschläge vorgelegt werden, hat gleichzeitig die große Mehrheit unserer Mitglieder, die sich nicht geäußert hat, zum Ausdruck gebracht, dass sie mit dem Text leben kann.

Zweitens, wir müssen bei der weiteren Arbeit das Mandat beachten, welches die Nizza-Konferenz uns auf den Weg gegeben hat. Wir sollen die Verträge vereinfachen, ohne sie inhaltlich zu verändern. Für die Zuständigkeiten der Union kann das nur bedeuten, dass wir den heutigen gemeinschaftlichen Besitzstand respektieren, ohne an ihm wesentliche Veränderungen vorzunehmen.

Drittens, aus meinen Vorschlägen zu Artikel 1 bis 7 hebe ich zweierlei hervor: Die europäische Verfassung muss die Werte und die geistigen Grundlagen zum Ausdruck bringen, auf denen Europa beruht. Ein früherer deutscher Bundespräsident hat gesagt: Es gibt drei Hügel, von denen das Abendland seinen Ausgang genommen hat: die Akropolis in Athen, das Kapitol in Rom und Golgatha in Jerusalem. In diesem Sinne sollte die europäische Verfassung für die Gläubigen einen Bezug zu Gott als Quelle universeller Werte enthalten. Gleichzeitig sollte sie zum Ausdruck bringen, dass viele Menschen diese Wertvorstellungen aus anderen Quellen ableiten. Wir sollten uns hierfür an die polnische Verfassung anlehnen. Ferner sollte in Artikel 3 als Unionsziel auch der Schutz von Ehe und Familie aufgenommen werden.

Sowohl Artikel 1 Absatz 2 als auch Artikel 9 Absatz 6 bringen den Respekt der Union vor der nationalen Identität der Mitgliedstaaten zum Ausdruck. Ich plädiere dafür, dass in diesem Zusammenhang das Prinzip der lokalen Selbstverwaltung und die rechtliche Stellung der Kirchen als Teil der nationalen Identität klar zum Ausdruck gebracht wird. In welchem Artikel dies geschieht, ist dem gegenüber zweitrangig. <BRK>

Andriukaitis (Parl.-LT). – The European Union has made up its mind about the anthem of the Union: Beethoven's Ode to Joy. Presently we are drafting an EU constitution. We do this primarily to bring the Union closer to its people. Therefore we should draft a constitution that would match Beethoven's Ode in its resonance. In my view, the Charter of Fundamental Rights has the resonance of the Union's anthem and should therefore constitute Part 1 of the constitution that we are drafting. It is regrettable that we are not discussing the structure of the constitutional treaty. In this respect Jo Leinen's draft is a good example of a clearer constitution.

Let me say a few words on the first draft articles. I find the title of the Treaty itself – the "Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe" – not precise enough. I suggest that we insert the word "Union" so that it reads: the Treaty establishing a Constitution for the European Union. I also suggest that the words "on a federal basis" be omitted in Article 1(1) and transferred to Article 8(1). In Article 1 of the draft it is important to emphasise that we are not establishing a new Union; we are only drafting a new constitutional treaty which consolidates and expands on the principles and provisions of the existing Treaties. It is especially important that this treaty is being drafted not only for people and states, but also for citizens.

In the list of the Union's values I missed one of the principal ones: equality. This mistake should be rectified. The same is true concerning respect for national identity. We should not refer only to national identity but also to the sovereignty of Member States. <BRK>

EN

Vitorino (CE). – Our task is to rewrite the Treaties in order to simplify them. However, at the same time we should avoid moving back from current European Union law. We are rewriting, not receding. Therefore the possible inclusion of the principle of the primacy of Community law in Article 1 would be welcome. It is a long-standing principle that has been applied without interruption since the founding of the European Community. Therefore it is worth mentioning in the first article of the draft constitution, immediately after respect for the Member States' national identity, which is equally important.

I strongly support the maintenance of the principle of the double legitimacy of the Union. We are writing a new treaty endorsed by Member States; but the source of legitimisation of the new treaty establishing a constitution is that it makes the Union a union of states and of peoples. This is the starting point of the exercise. It should also be the starting point of the constitution.

On specific amendments, I welcome the amendment that clarifies that the Union administers certain common competencies on a federal basis, but at the same time the Union contributes to and ensures the coordination of the policies of Member States. This is the way I would recommend clarifying and improving the current drafting, without diverging from the original spirit of the Praesidium.

I welcome other amendments, such as those that emphasise the protection and improvement of the environment; those on establishing a balance between a market economy open to free competition and access to services of general interest; and those making a specific reference not only to a common external and security policy but also to a common defence policy, along the lines suggested by Mr Barnier.

The first articles could be improved but I hope that the Convention will recognise that the Praesidium is moving in the right direction. With your support and your improvements we can succeed. <BRK>

Kalniete (Gouv.-LV). – Merci Monsieur le Président. Tout d'abord, je voudrais faire une observation de caractère général. La création de l'Union européenne s'appuie sur plusieurs Traités fondateurs. La décision de modification de ces Traités s'effectue par le biais de nouveaux Traités avec l'accord de tous les pays membres. Pour cette raison, je préfère le terme "Traité constitutionnel" qui m'apparaît plus approprié que celui de "Constitution" car il désigne une union d'Etats souverains. La notion de Traité constitutionnel doit également être incorporée dans le corps du texte même de façon à insister sur l'accord volontaire des pays membres.

Ensuite, je considère que l'appellation actuelle d'Union européenne doit être préservée. Elle reflète la forme de coopération des Etats dans la perspective d'objectifs communs. Les citoyens d'Europe s'y sont accoutumés et s'y reconnaissent.

Enfin, je voudrais insister sur toute l'importance aux yeux de la Lettonie, d'une Union européenne signifiant une union d'Etats souverains. Et, en conséquence, permettez-moi de souligner la confusion que pourrait créer auprès des citoyens la référence dans le Traité constitutionnel au mot "fédéral". En réalité, le message à faire passer auprès de nos populations est celui de la réalisation d'une Union sans cesse plus étroite entre les Etats membres.

En conclusion, je voudrais vous dire toute l'importance que nous attachons à la préparation du Traité constitutionnel. Gardons-nous de toute précipitation car ce document fera l'identité des citoyens européens au regard du monde dans les décennies à venir. Merci Monsieur le Président. <BRK>

Einem (Parl.-AT). - Herr Präsident! Im Sinne dessen, was auch schon Ben Fayot gesagt hat, treten wir erstens dafür ein, dass man die Charta voll inhaltlich samt den horizontalen Artikeln als Teil I verwendet, weil uns das die Formulierung der Artikel 2 und 3 deutlich erleichtern soll. Zweitens, wir sind der Überzeugung, dass die Bürger mit in den Artikel 1 aufgenommen werden sollen. Drittens, wir glauben, dass die Gleichheit von Frau und Mann als Grundsatz aufgenommen werden sollte, und wir treten dafür ein, lieber von Grundsätzen - principles - statt von Werten - valeurs - zu sprechen. Viertens, die soziale Dimension der Europäischen Union muss in den Artikeln 2 und 3 Ausdruck finden. Dazu zählen beispielsweise auch die Dienste von allgemeinem Interesse und ihre Zugänglichkeit oder das Prinzip der Vollbeschäftigung, das wir anstreben.

Fünftens, wir denken, dass Nachhaltigkeit und Umweltschutz zu den Zielen zählen, Nachhaltigkeit allerdings auch zu den Grundsätzen, die wir verfolgen und beachten wollen. Sechstens, um es kurz zu machen, von einem Gottesbezug in der Verfassung oder von der Religion in der Präambel halte ich nichts. Ich denke allerdings, dass es sinnvoll ist, das Minimum an liberalen Rechten für die Kirchen und Religionsgemeinschaften zu sichern. <BRK>

Lamassoure (PE). – Merci Monsieur le Président, je vais essayer. Je traiterai de deux points avec le souci de vous faciliter la tâche pour trouver un compromis.

Premièrement, vous l'avez dit Monsieur le Président, l'Union est une construction politique originale mêlant caractère confédéral et fédéral. Il est utile, dès l'article premier, de décrire ce modèle, et je crois que nous avons besoin selon moi à l'article premier, de préciser les droits et devoirs respectifs de l'Union et des Etats membres. D'un côté, nous disons, l'Union respecte l'identité des Etats membres. Précisons, y compris la nature et le fondement de leur régime politique. Pourquoi? Il y a parmi nous des monarchies et des républiques, des Etats unitaires et des Etats fédéraux. Certains sont laïques, d'autres se réfèrent à un fondement religieux, vous en avez parlé. La formule permet de prendre en compte ces différences, Dieu est juste en filigrane. Ajoutons qu'un Etat doit avoir le droit de quitter l'Union. C'est la manière la plus forte de garantir le respect de la souveraineté nationale. Naturellement, cela devra être exceptionnel. Il faudra des procédures exceptionnelles mais c'est un point important. Vous avez dit, à juste titre, que la formule historique d'une Union sans cesse plus étroite gêne certains collègues. En même temps, personne ne conteste l'intérêt d'un rapprochement entre les peuples eux-mêmes. Je propose d'écrire: "Les Etats membres s'engagent entre eux à une solidarité sans cesse plus étroite, au sein de l'Union comme en dehors d'elle".

Deuxièmement, les citoyens sont évidemment attentifs aux symboles extérieurs de l'Union. Un des tout premiers articles pourrait rappeler, comme le propose notre collègue, le drapeau, l'hymne, la fête du 9 mai. N'oublions pas les villes capitales, le triangle historique Bruxelles-Luxembourg-Strasbourg. N'oublions pas la monnaie qui est une des caractéristiques communes de l'Union. Il faudrait, enfin, ajouter une devise. Sur ce point, pourquoi ne pas lancer une consultation beaucoup plus large qu'au sein de notre seule Convention car il faut trouver une formule qui parle au cœur de toutes et de tous. Je vous remercie. <BRK>

Le Président. – Je dirai un seul mot simplement sur un des points que vous avez traité. Vous m'avez écrit, d'ailleurs. J'ai reçu vos amendements et j'en ai pris connaissance.

Sur la question du droit de sortie éventuel, je crois qu'il s'agit d'une question très importante et qui a des conséquences politiques et de perception du système. Nous avons plutôt envisagé de le mettre dans les dispositions finales. En effet, il est un peu difficile de dire dès le départ "si vous voulez partir", plutôt que dans les dispositions finales. Dans ce cas-là, on pourrait dire que ce n'est pas la peine d'entrer. Mais l'idée sera traitée à un moment ou à un autre.

Ce que vous dites au sujet des symboles est repris par d'autres amendements sur l'article 3. Nous les retrouverons probablement tout à l'heure.

La parole est à Monsieur Farnleitner. Ensuite, nous prendrons quelques cartons bleus. <BRK>

Farnleitner (Ch.E/G.-AT). - Herr Präsident! Sie haben der geringen Anzahl der Änderungsanträge, die ich eingereicht habe, entnommen, wie hoch meine Achtung vor der klaren Sprache dieser ersten Artikel ist, und ich habe mich daher möglichst wenig an den Wettbewerben beteiligt. Es kann doch nicht wahr sein, dass man so einfach Dinge sagen kann, wo so viele Juristen darauf warten, damit Geld zu verdienen!

Zweite Bemerkung, ich persönlich habe mit dem Wort "föederal" nach mehrmaligem Lesen gerade in den unterschiedlichen Sprachen Probleme. Ich bitte sie daher, darüber nachzudenken, ob man nicht formulieren sollte, dass die EU gemeinschaftlich bestimmte Kompetenzen wahrnimmt, weil die Gemeinschaftsmethode den Transfer von Kompetenzen sicher stellt. Meine zweite Anregung betrifft die Zielsetzungen. Ich möchte sehr dafür plädieren, dass wir die soziale Marktwirtschaft, den sozialen Frieden und die Achtung und Entwicklung der regionalen, sprachlichen und kulturellen Vielfalt als Zielsetzung verankern. Drittens sollte man der Charta wirklich einen hervorragenden Rang in den ersten Artikeln einräumen, dann erspart man sich spätere Artikel. <BRK>

Le Président. – Je vous remercie. Je reviens, si vous me le permettez, puisqu'il faut animer un peu ce débat, sur la question du mot "fédéral". Il y a beaucoup d'amendements de suppression. Mais il y a aussi une culture fédérale ou fédéraliste qui existe en Europe ou qui existe dans la jeunesse, ou qui existe dans certains cercles. Donc, il faut voir si nous avons intérêt ou non à faire de notre texte un texte qui exprime une synthèse européenne. Si vous retirez le mot "fédéral", ce qui est possible vu que ce terme n'est pas vital, et le remplacez par "communautaire", vous écarterez cette synthèse. Vous aurez une série de gens qui diront qu'on ne veut pas aller dans la direction d'un modèle classique, connu depuis Montesquieu et qui a alimenté beaucoup de systèmes de pensée. C'est pourquoi ce sujet est important. A cet effet, j'aimerais que les uns et les autres s'expriment car nous tiendrons compte de ces que vous allez nous dire.

Nous allons prendre quatre cartons bleus : Monsieur Spini, Monsieur MacCormick, Madame Dybkjær et Monsieur Wuermeling. La parole est à Monsieur Spini. <BRK>

IT

Spini (Parl.-IT). - Signor Presidente, il caso vuole che le possa venire immediatamente in aiuto, nel senso che lo scopo principale del mio carton bleu è di precisare che, per quanto riguarda l'emendamento che ho presentato insieme all'onorevole Paciotti, rappresentante supplente del Parlamento europeo - emendamento che mira a inserire nella parte prima dell'articolo 1 il ruolo dei cittadini - per un errore tecnico, nella prima stesura non era stata inserita l'espressione "sul modello federale", mentre, nella prima pagina dell'addendum che è stato distribuito, il modello federale figura. Questo, proprio perché condiviso con tutto il cuore le sue parole, cioè che cancellare questa parola avrebbe oggi un significato estremamente negativo, che in particolare le giovani generazioni europee non ci perdonerebbero. <BRK>

MacCormick (PE). – In introducing Article 3 you said that those of us who had suggested a reference to linguistic diversity were mistaken because that is not, in itself, an objective of the Union. I should like to I remind you that the phrase we are looking at says: "the richness of its cultural diversity is respected". The suggestion is to say: "the richness of its cultural and linguistic diversity is respected". The point, therefore, is not to promote diversity of languages but to promote respect for the diversity that we already have. That is important, as it is, in Article 1(2), to insert respect for regional and local autonomy within the states, as this looks forward to the issue of the democratic life of the Union later on. After all, the text by the Praesidium was drafted before the debate on 7 February 2003, in which many people spoke about the importance of this dimension of Europe. There needs to be some response by the Praesidium to that debate, which was held after its draft was published. <BRK>

EN

Dybkjær (PE). – Can you guarantee that when we finish with the first paragraphs, we will not be in a situation where we have taken a step backwards? Will he consider the wording in relation to that? Can we guarantee that we will have the words "equality", "disability" and "sustainability" in the first paragraphs? If we do not, we will have taken a step backwards.

In relation to the further work, it is important that we discuss not only the present Treaties but how we could improve on them. That would make our work easier and we would not have so many amendments. <BRK>

FR

Le Président. – Nous ne ferons pas un pas en arrière sur ce sujet. Vous étiez intervenue d'ailleurs la fois dernière. Vous aviez posé cette question et je vous avais répondu. Le seul point est de savoir où on le met dans les articles. C'est un point pratique. Il faut que les notions soient groupées. Ce n'est pas dans l'article 1, qui est un article de droit public. Alors, est-ce dans les objectifs, est-ce dans les valeurs? Se limite-t-on à l'égalité entre les hommes et les femmes ou dit-on l'égalité de tous les êtres dans l'Union européenne parce qu'il y a un système plus global d'égalité? En tout cas, il n'y aura pas de recul et cette mention figurera dans les premiers articles. <BRK>

Wuermeling (PE). - Herr Präsident! Um mich zu finden, brauchen Sie nur in die Mitte zu schauen; dort findet man mich, und hier fühle ich mich auch wohl! Es kann wohl nicht darum gehen, den Begriff "föederal" ersatzlos zu streichen, aber er hat zwei Schwächen. Die erste Schwäche dieses Begriffes ist, dass er zwei völlig unterschiedliche Bedeutungen hat, die gegensätzlich sind. Es könnte auch ein Vorteil sein. Ich sehe es aber als eine Schwäche an. Das zweite ist, dass er nicht offen ist. Es ist ein Begriff, der auf bestehende Modelle von Zusammenschlüssen verweist. Wir aber müssen die Europäische Union in einer völligen Offenheit im Hinblick auf das Modell konstruieren. Es wäre, glaube ich, für die Entwicklung eines so einzigartigen Zusammenschlusses, der am Ende 500 Millionen Einwohner umfasst, fatal, wenn wir uns an bestehenden, hergebrachten traditionellen Begriffen orientieren würden. Deswegen haben wir auch nicht vorgeschlagen, den Begriff zu streichen, sondern wir haben - ähnlich wie Herr Farnleitner - vorgeschlagen, einfach auf die Gemeinschaftsmethode, auf das gemeinschaftliche Handeln zu verweisen, damit wir uns so organisieren können, wie wir das in unserer Union tun müssen. <BRK>

Le Président. – Il y a encore d'autres cartons bleus mais nous les prendrons après une nouvelle série d'orateurs pour respecter l'équilibre. Nous les inscrivons au fur et à mesure. La parole est à Monsieur Costa. <BRK>

PT

Costa (Parl.-PT). - Senhor Presidente, a única razão realmente séria que temos para agora deixar de falar de Tratado e passar a falar de Tratado Constitucional ou de Constituição reside no novo lugar que damos aos direitos dos europeus. É aí que está a diferença adquirida neste momento. Se assim é, um princípio de transparência mandaria que se rejeitasse totalmente a ideia de retirar o teor da Carta para os fundos da Constituição e militar a favor de que o teor da Carta abrisse a nossa Constituição. Essa é de momento a nossa matéria constitucional.

Confesso, Senhor Presidente, que não estou satisfeito com o recurso à ideia da gestão em moldes federais de certas competências para elaborar o conceito constitucional da nossa União. Aliás, os que gostam de transparência perguntariam de seguida onde está a delimitação entre as competências a gerir em moldes federais, as competências a não gerir em moldes federais, os mecanismos de federalização e eventuais cláusulas de flexibilidade. Ninguém pensa nisto e, portanto, não se está a pensar com clareza.

Julgo que o caminho para definir o conceito seria estabelecer os grandes fins, que são conhecidos, fixar o modo de exercício dos poderes necessários provenientes dos Estados soberanos e fixar as regras de relação com a realidade democrática circundante. Estou a pensar no princípio da igualdade dos Estados, estou a pensar no princípio da proximidade e estou a pensar no respeito pela diversidade, a famosa eurodiversidade que tem que integrar o núcleo conceptual da nossa União.

Seria muito desagradável que incorporássemos uma espécie de federalismo mínimo ou de federalismo sectorial e, em contrapartida, não tivéssemos sequer o princípio da igualdade dos Estados, que costuma acompanhar em tão alto lugar a consagração do princípio federal. Eis por que razão, Senhor Presidente, proponho uma rescrita deste conceito. Para terminar, apoio a ideia da coesão territorial; no caso de se consagrar um alto nível de segurança como objectivo para a União deve consagrar-se igualmente uma alta qualidade na prestação da justiça, sob pena de distorção do modelo europeu do Estado de direito. E, por último, no âmbito da acção externa, julgo que se justificava consagrar a promoção de soluções multilaterais para expressar uma opção metodológica diferente da opção do império, o que me parece ressaltar da história europeia, de um continente que já conheceu democracias e impérios. <BRK>

Meyer (Parl.-DE). - Herr Präsident! Drei Anmerkungen in zwei Minuten, die erste betrifft das Verfahren. Ich begrüße Ihre Zusage sehr, die Sie eingangs der Sitzung gemacht haben, dass die Frist für die Einreichung von Änderungsvorschlägen zu den Formulierungen des Präsidiums künftig in etwa zwei Wochen betragen soll. Ich möchte dem einen Wunsch der Europapolitiker des Deutschen Bundestages hinzufügen, der heute Vormittag von den Delegierten vieler nationaler Parlamente geteilt wurde. Ich möchte um die Zusage bitten, dass auch Änderungsanträge, die aufgrund der Debatten in den nationalen Parlamenten etwas später - also sagen wir nach drei Wochen - kommen, dokumentiert und allen Delegierten zugänglich gemacht werden. Wir brauchen die Hilfe der Parlamente, und am Ende auch ihre Zustimmung. Das sollten wir nie vergessen.

Zweite Anmerkung: Zur Grundrechtecharta ist einiges gesagt worden, und ich finde, die Struktur der Verfassung kann nicht mehr so offen sein, wie es vorhin in Ihrer Anmerkung noch ein bisschen den Anschein hatte, denn es ist eine Frage der Bedeutung der Grundrechte, eine Frage des Respekts vor der Arbeit des ersten Konvents, aber auch eine Frage der Methodik, die Charta an den Anfang zu stellen. Nur so können wir Wiederholungen vermeiden, und ich will das mit ein paar Hinweisen belegen. Die geistig-religiöse Debatte über das europäische Erbe müssen wir nicht neu aufrollen. Wir haben dazu eine Formulierung in der Präambel der Grundrechtecharta gefunden. Das Zusammenwachsen Europas in Artikel 1 aufzunehmen ist dann unnötig, wenn wir die Präambel der Grundrechtecharta entsprechend den Vorschlägen der Arbeitsgruppe Vitorino übernehmen. In Artikel 2 müssen wir Solidarität und Gleichheit nicht im Einzelnen ausdifferenzieren, das ist in den Kapiteln 3 und 4 der Grundrechtecharta schon geschehen. Wir müssen nicht die Arbeit des ersten Konvents wiederholen.

Dritte Anmerkung: die Arbeitsgruppe "Soziales Europa" hat wichtige Vorschläge gemacht und viele Delegierte haben den Vorschlag übernommen, sozialen Zusammenhalt und Wettbewerbswirtschaft im Ziel "soziale Marktwirtschaft" zusammenzuführen. Ich bitte herzlich, mit diesem Beispiel die Arbeit der Arbeitsgruppen und ihre Schlussberichte vor allem dann, wenn sie hier im Plenum große Zustimmung gefunden haben, zu respektieren. Das sollte eine Richtschnur für die Arbeit des Präsidiums sein. <BRK>

Le Président. – Monsieur Meyer, nous verrons avec le secrétariat et le praesidium comment traiter cette affaire de place dans le texte. Probablement, pour le rendre plus concret il faudrait qu'on imprime les deux formules. Il est vrai que du point de vue de la démarche, c'est plus commode que la Charte soit avant. Vous avez raison. Du point de vue de la lecture par les citoyens, c'est le contraire. Il y a un choix à faire et, par conséquent, nous proposerons sans doute les deux formules pour voir quels sont leurs avantages et leurs inconvénients respectifs, ce qui ne change rien au fond, bien entendu.

De Villepin (Ch.E/G.-FR). – Monsieur le Président, chers collègues, avant même d'aborder les articles que nous examinons aujourd'hui, je voudrais dire que nous devons faire face avec exigence aux difficultés qui résultent de la situation internationale comme vous l'avez dit en introduction, Monsieur le Président. Elles doivent nous inciter à engager une réflexion approfondie sur la place qui doit être celle de l'Union européenne dans le monde. Et je sais que nous y reviendrons plus tard, comme vous l'avez proposé d'ailleurs Monsieur le Président.

Je remercie le praesidium pour ces premiers articles. Nous avons conscience de la difficulté et de la lourdeur de la tâche qui vous incombe. Pour nos travaux, nous devons convenir d'une méthode qui garantisse le caractère collectif et rigoureux de notre travail. Les membres de la Convention doivent notamment disposer d'un délai suffisant pour procéder à l'examen des articles et déposer des amendements. Je sais que le praesidium s'y emploie.

Sur le fond, je souhaite insister sur quelques points concernant les articles 1 à 3. L'article 1 doit conserver la référence emblématique à une Union sans cesse plus étroite entre les peuples de l'Europe. C'est un acquis essentiel et une garantie de la poursuite de l'intégration européenne. Par ailleurs, je propose d'introduire dans cet article la notion de fédération d'Etat-nation, qui témoigne bien de la synthèse que constitue le projet européen entre une Union des peuples et une Union d'Etats souverains.

L'article 2 sur les valeurs me convient et je salue la sagesse du praesidium. Ne rouvrons pas les débats difficiles qui ont déjà été tranchés par la précédente Convention sur la Charte des Droits fondamentaux.

L'article 3 sur les objectifs appelle plusieurs observations. Il doit être complété par la mention d'objectifs sociaux tels que définis par le groupe de travail sur l'Europe sociale, y compris ceux relatifs au service d'intérêt général. C'est à cette condition que nous pourrions concrétiser la volonté que nous partageons tous d'un renforcement du modèle social européen fondé sur l'équilibre entre progrès économique et justice sociale.

Ensuite, je propose de renforcer la mention du développement durable en le citant parmi les buts de l'Union, énoncé dès le premier paragraphe de l'article 3. Je propose, en outre, d'ajouter dans cet article que l'Union vise à promouvoir un niveau élevé de protection et d'amélioration de l'environnement. Je crois également que l'intégration des exigences environnementales dans les autres politiques devrait figurer parmi les principes sur lesquels l'Union est fondée. Il me paraît enfin important de mentionner qu'un des buts de l'Union est de préserver l'acquis de la construction européenne. Je pense notamment au domaine du marché intérieur et de la concurrence.

En conclusion, Monsieur le Président, nous constatons aujourd'hui, à travers la crise irakienne, les divisions de l'Europe. Plus que jamais, nous devons réaffirmer notre ambition commune. Je vous remercie.

McAvan (PE). – Article 1 of the new constitution should try to capture in a nutshell the essence of the European Union. The draft from the Praesidium starts off well - but then loses it after the first phrase. Why? Because it talks about a Union within which "the policies of the Member States shall be coordinated". Does that mean all of them or some of them? We need to be clear about defining what we mean by "the European Union". We should say "the Union of Member States which have freely chosen to work together in certain areas". It would add something to the lisibilité of the constitution if we said a word or two about the why. The answer is quite simple: because they feel they can achieve more by working together than by working alone. That might be covered in the preamble, but it is important that when people read it they understand why we want the European Union.

You also spoke of the need to mention that powers derive from the Member States. It should be said more explicitly under Article 1(2). This is a democratic guarantee for our citizens and can stop this mistaken notion that somehow the Union exists and has powers that come from nowhere. It is very important that people understand how it was founded, where its powers come from. They come from the will of the peoples of Europe.

Mr Fayot very kindly said all that needs to be said on Articles 2 and 3 on behalf of the Socialist family, except that I feel there is a case for including equality between men and women among the values under Article 2.

You invited us to say something about the place of religion. It would be very divisive if we started talking about Christian traditions etc. at this time. It would offend the many millions of people from different faiths and indeed those of no faith at all. We should leave those things alone. We should talk about an inclusive Europe. If we follow along the lines suggested by Mr Fayot we will have that. <BRK>

Lenmarker (Parl.-SE). – I should like to focus on Article 3(4). Outside Europe the general idea is that Europe is inward-looking. We even speak about a fortress Europe. Certainly it is true that the European Union is too protectionist in some respects. This weakens our ability to act in the outside world. Therefore it is important to include in Article 3(4) the principle and objective of openness to the outside world, so that we can see that Europe really is open, and that Europe is not only concerned with itself or defending its own interests, but also takes on a wider responsibility.

The good values of Europe are not only European, but universal. That should also be reflected in Article 3(4).

The name of the Union should be "the European Union". I also underline – and this comes into a joint Swedish amendment – that we need a definition of who the contracting partners – the Member States – in this constitution are. It must be clear.

I support the PPE-DE amendments on Articles 1 and 3. <BRK>

Le Président. – Merci, Monsieur Lennmarker. Sur ce dernier point, qui est un point à la fois juridique et de courtoisie, il y a les deux. Les hautes parties contractantes, elles, figureront dans la présentation du texte, comme d'ailleurs dans les Traités où les hautes parties contractantes ne sont pas dans les articles. Elles sont en général dans une déclaration initiale. On reprendra cette formule qui est, je crois, la formule adaptée. Je voudrais dire à Monsieur Meyer qui m'écoute avec attention je vois, je le comprends, un mot à propos des amendements tardifs. Nous essayons d'avoir une discussion commune des amendements. Donc, il vaut mieux qu'ils puissent être déposés en même temps afin de permettre aux uns et aux autres de les défendre et de les comparer. Mais vous gardez en permanence le droit de déposer des textes. Donc, si un parlementaire national, à la suite des travaux de son parlement, veut déposer une nouvelle proposition d'article ou autre, il peut naturellement le faire. Cela facilite notre tâche si on joint ces amendements à la discussion des articles. Mais si ce n'est pas possible, il garde le droit, bien sûr, de déposer son projet.

La parole est à Monsieur Fischer. <BRK>

Fischer (Ch.E/G.-DE). - Herr Präsident! Der Entwurf des Präsidiums ist unseres Erachtens eine sehr gute Grundlage für eine transparente Kompetenzordnung, die der Union gleichzeitig die notwendigen Spielräume für eine flexible Fortentwicklung belässt. Natürlich sind zahlreiche Einzelfragen noch zu klären, siehe die schriftlichen Beiträge. Aber darauf will ich jetzt nicht im Einzelnen eingehen. Was mich beschäftigt, ist die Sorge um die Zukunft des Konvents, die angesichts der aktuellen Situation an Bedeutungskraft für die Zukunft der Union noch erheblich gewonnen hat. Wir befinden uns jetzt an der entscheidenden Wegkreuzung. Die Art und Weise, wie wir in den kommenden Wochen mit der vor uns stehenden Herausforderung fertig werden, wird über Erfolg oder Misserfolg unseres Projekts entscheiden. Dabei meine ich nicht in erster Linie die über tausend Änderungsanträge - hier setzen wir voll auf die Weisheit und auf die Erfahrung des Präsidiums -, Sorge machen mir vielmehr die Stimmen, die einer Verlängerung des Konvents das Wort reden. Richtig ist, entscheidend ist der politische Wille, zu einem ehrgeizigen Ergebnis zu kommen. Meines Erachtens ist das wichtiger denn je.

Die aktuellen Ereignisse sollten uns nicht entmutigen, sondern im Gegenteil, sie sollten uns beflügeln und anspornen. Sie führen uns überdeutlich vor Augen, dass jeder einzelne europäische Staat - auch der größte - für sich allein genommen oder in wechselnden Allianzen seine Interessen in der Welt des 21. Jahrhunderts nicht mehr wirksam verteidigen können. Nur gemeinsam, als Europäische Union, haben wir Europäer eine Chance, uns im 21. Jahrhundert zu behaupten. Die aktuelle Krise zeigt, dass das bittere machtpolitische Wirklichkeit ist. Für den Konvent muss das heißen: Wir sollten unseren Ehrgeiz auch - aber nicht nur - in der gemeinsamen Außen- und Sicherheitspolitik nicht dämpfen, sondern steigern. Es ist meines Erachtens falsch zu sagen, weil die letzten Tage gezeigt haben, dass der Wille zu gemeinsamem politischen Handeln noch nicht vorhanden ist, brauchen wir auch keine europäischen Institutionen. Ich glaube, das Gegenteil ist vielmehr der Fall. Wir brauchen wesentlich stärkere europäische Institutionen als bisher, um in diesem Rahmen unseren gemeinsamen politischen Willen bilden zu können.

Natürlich geht so etwas nicht von heute auf morgen. Ein solcher politischer Prozess braucht Zeit, vielleicht sogar lange Zeit. Umso dringender ist es, diesen institutionellen Rahmen so rasch wie möglich zu schaffen. Wichtig ist hier vor allem die Stärkung der supranationalen Elemente, wie etwa der Kommission. Deshalb müssen wir jetzt alle unsere politische Energie daran setzen, den Zeitplan einzuhalten. Eine Verzögerung hätte meines Erachtens eine völlig negative Signalwirkung. Der Konvent darf sich nicht in technischen Einzelheiten verlieren, sondern muss sich auf die politische Substanz und auf die große historische Herausforderung, vor der wir stehen, konzentrieren. Wir müssen unser Ziel erreichen, die europäische Verfassung im Entwurf bis zum Sommer vorzulegen, damit sie bis zum Ende dieses Jahres von der Regierungskonferenz gebilligt werden kann. Dies, Herr Präsident, ist wichtiger denn je!

Dini (Parl.-IT). - Signor Presidente, esprimo un giudizio complessivamente positivo sull'articolato che il Praesidium ci ha presentato, e ciò per la sua chiarezza e linearità. Esso contiene l'affermazione di principi essenziali per l'avanzamento dell'Unione: per esempio, l'affermazione che le competenze comuni vanno gestite, come lei ci ha ricordato, sul modello federale, secondo la formula, che tutti abbiamo condiviso, di federazione di Stati nazione, ciò che dovrebbe essere all'articolo 1; l'attribuzione all'Unione della personalità giuridica, all'articolo 4; la codificazione del primato del diritto comunitario su quello degli Stati membri, che viene poi, all'articolo 9.

Gli obiettivi e le competenze dell'Unione vanno rafforzati, mai indeboliti: questa è, secondo me, la stella polare con cui il Praesidium dovrebbe procedere nella scrittura della Costituzione per l'Europa. Questo non mi sembra essere stato sempre il caso nel testo dei primi sedici articoli, che oggi discutiamo, dove ci sono alcune omissioni che potrebbero apparire un indebolimento dei Trattati esistenti. Manca, tra gli obiettivi dell'Unione, all'articolo 3, quello della difesa dell'indipendenza e dell'integrità dell'Unione stessa, prevista all'articolo 11 del Trattato sull'Unione europea, che è intesa a rafforzare in prospettiva il carattere politico dell'Unione; manca anche il richiamo alle Nazioni Unite come istituzione universale, fulcro della legalità internazionale. Un riferimento alle Nazioni Unite è, invece, presente nell'articolo 11 del Trattato sull'Unione europea che, oggi più che mai, credo debba essere riaffermato. Arretrata, rispetto ai Trattati vigenti, è anche la formulazione del comma 4 dell'articolo 10, che parla di progressiva realizzazione di una politica di difesa comune; ora, l'articolo 17 del Trattato sull'Unione già parla di una difesa comune, raggiungibile senza una revisione dei Trattati, con una semplice decisione del Consiglio europeo; il concetto deve essere elaborato da qualche parte. Sulla politica estera, di sicurezza e difesa bisogna essere più ambiziosi di quanto proposto, superando radicalmente la struttura a pilastri, e affermare che queste materie, pur con la loro peculiarità e procedure particolari, debbono essere incluse fra le competenze dell'Unione.

Occorre andare avanti partendo dalle acquisizioni fissate nei Trattati, che vanno codificate nella nuova Costituzione, come, ad esempio, l'obiettivo della libera concorrenza - che è stato sottolineato anche da Monsieur de Villepin - che va con chiarezza incluso nell'articolo sulle competenze esclusive dell'Unione.

Ripeto, signor Presidente: è importante che il Praesidium, nel linguaggio che usa nella bozza degli articoli, non dia l'impressione di fare passi indietro rispetto ai Trattati esistenti. Questa è una raccomandazione forte che intendo fare. <BRK>

Di Rupo (Parl.-BE). – Monsieur le Président, je partage le point de vue exprimé par bon nombre de collègues notamment sur notre responsabilité historique. Il nous faut de l'ambition non seulement pour nous-mêmes mais pour les générations futures.

Par rapport aux trois premiers articles, dans l'article 2, je pense que, comme vous l'indiquiez tout à l'heure, c'est davantage l'égalité de tous les êtres qu'il faut indiquer et non pas uniquement l'égalité entre les femmes et les hommes. On ne doit pas se laisser distraire par une absence de définition juridique claire à cet égard. Il s'agit bien de valeurs et on peut d'ailleurs se référer à l'actuel article 7 du Traité de l'Union en la matière.

En ce qui concerne les objectifs sociaux, il me semble que nous manquerions à nos responsabilités si nous n'indiquions pas quelques objectifs tels que l'accès de tous à l'éducation, l'accès de tous à la formation, à des services d'intérêt général de qualité ou encore le fait que nous voulons lutter contre toutes les formes de discrimination ou d'inégalité.

En ce qui concerne, comme l'a indiqué Monsieur Lamassoure, la souveraineté des Etats, vous avez dit que ce serait peut-être dans les dispositions finales plutôt que dans les premières dispositions, ce que je peux comprendre. Mais il faut une disposition qui permette à un Etat de quitter l'Union. Je pense que c'est une manière assez élégante non pas de freiner l'ensemble des Etats membres de l'Union mais plutôt de marquer son désaccord profond et puis de faire son destin seul.

En ce qui concerne le caractère fédéral, je pense que supprimer le mot "fédéral" serait interprété par une très large partie de l'opinion, et singulièrement par les jeunes, comme un recul. Et permettez-moi de dire ceci, si c'est pour avoir un Traité qui institue la Constitution ou la Constitution avec des conditions et des clauses qui seraient inférieures à ce que l'on trouve dans les Traités actuels, Monsieur le Président, ce serait triste. Et je voudrais quitter cette Convention en ayant eu le sentiment d'avoir contribué à quelque chose d'utile.

En ce qui concerne d'éventuelles références aux valeurs religieuses à l'article 2, je dis non. Vous avez vous-même d'ailleurs, clairement indiqué que les références présentes dans le préambule de la Charte et le respect des Eglises qu'on pourrait indiquer dans l'annexe de la future Constitution, paraissent suffisants. Nous devons garder ce principe fondamental sans brouiller les images, en restant clairs par rapport à nos opinions. L'Etat est une chose, les Eglises en sont une autre. L'Etat se doit d'être impartial et de garantir la diversité et l'exercice de toutes les religions bien entendu. <BRK>

Rovna (Gouv.-CZ). – Unlike the draft presented by the Commission in early December 2002, the present draft lacks the distinctive dimension of a multi-level constitutionality on which the future Union is to be founded. It reflects the multi-level identity of its citizens – local, state and Union – and unites the individual constitution levels in a single consistent entity.

This concept of constitutional complementarity corresponds to the established practice of the European Court of Justice. This makes Community law an integral part of the legal orders of Member States, both by means of direct effect and by virtue of the supremacy of Community law. Also, in terms of clarity of wording and legal economy, the present draft has not fully exploited its potential.

As to Article 1(1), the opening sentence starts with a correct reference to two sources of the democratic legitimacy of the constitution: the peoples and the states of Europe. However, the phrase "reflecting the will" would be more appropriate in a preamble.

As to the functions, we propose to begin with common policies, as the supranational function defining the Union; secondly, common competences as a policy tool; thirdly, coordination as an expression of inter-state function. We propose replacing the term "federal" with "on the basis of ever closer union" and retaining the name "European Union". <BRK>

Duhamel (PE). – Monsieur le Président, une Constitution doit être courte et obscure, disait Napoléon. Cela a été dit par Sieyès mais aussi par Napoléon. Ils se sont accordés sur ce point d'ailleurs. Et nous, nous nous accordons contre. Pourquoi contre? Notre Constitution ne peut qu'être longue. Elle le sera forcément du fait des contraintes que nous subissons. Essayons qu'elle soit claire et qu'elle s'adresse aussi au citoyen. Or, dans nombre de nos articles, ce qui est l'objectif sera hors d'atteinte. Quand on attribue des pouvoirs, fixe des relations, précise des compétences, règle des procédures, on ne peut pas s'adresser au citoyen en tous ces points. Et, précisément parce qu'on ne peut pas échapper à ces tâches ingrates d'écriture complexe, nous devons aussi incorporer les dispositions constitutionnelles qui ont quelque chance d'intéresser les citoyens européens. Voilà pourquoi je voudrais insister sur trois points.

Premièrement, définir l'Union. L'article 1, qui le fait, contient l'essentiel. Mais on peut le dire plus fortement et mieux. C'est-à-dire qu'on peut partir de la volonté des peuples sur laquelle repose et nos Etats et l'Union, puis affirmer clairement la double légitimité de l'Union, celle des citoyens européens et des Etats membres. Quant à la fin de la phrase, n'ayons pas peur des mots lorsqu'ils confirment la réalité des choses. 15 % des conventionnels ont déposé des amendements pour supprimer le terme "fédéral". Mais le mot "fédéral" existe et la très grande majorité des conventionnels a donc raison de l'accepter.

Deuxièmement, symboliser l'Europe. Le projet de rédaction a oublié les symboles de l'Europe, ceux qui existent - le drapeau étoilé, l'hymne - et ceux qui méritent de s'y ajouter - une devise, un jour férié, fête de l'Europe -. Je ne comprends pas pourquoi le praesidium y a renoncé et comprendrai encore moins qu'il s'y oppose.

Enfin, consacrer la Charte. J'avais peur que vous ne persistiez dans l'idée de quelques uns de la reléguer dans je ne sais quel protocole. A vous entendre, vous avez compris son importance pour les citoyens. Vous l'avez sûrement relue et vous en avez apprécié la qualité.

Bien définir l'Union, la doter de symboles consacrés, incorporer la Charte. Voilà qui nous évitera d'avoir peur de notre ombre et donnera un peu de lumière à notre Constitution. <BRK>

FR

Le Président. – Je voudrais vous répondre sur les symboles. Il faudra mettre quelque chose sur les symboles. Effectivement, notre texte est un peu aride et manque de chaleur à cet égard. Il faudra donc mettre le drapeau, bien sûr. Il faudra mettre l'hymne mais pour cela il faut que l'hymne existe. Parce qu'actuellement, on joue comme hymne européen un extrait pas très défini de la Neuvième symphonie de Beethoven. Mais il faudrait savoir quand on le commence et quand on le finit. En outre, un hymne a des paroles. Et donc, nous avons, dans le milieu culturel européen, à faire travailler sur deux sujets, non pas la réécriture, mais la question du début et de la fin. En effet, quand on écoute l'hymne européen, on attend la fin mais on ne sait pas si ça va être maintenant ou quatre ou dix mesures plus tard. Il faudra également, d'ailleurs, réfléchir à un texte que l'on pourrait chanter lorsqu'on exécute l'hymne européen. Et si les crédits de la Convention ne sont pas épuisés, à la fin, on pourrait faire un concours modeste à cet égard.

Nous allons prendre quelques cartons bleus. Madame Maij-Weggen, vous êtes inscrites aussi comme orateur. On vous écouterait donc dans deux minutes. Nous entendrons Monsieur Kiljunen, Monsieur Roche, Monsieur MacLennan et Monsieur Borrell. La parole est à Monsieur Kiljunen. <BRK>

EN

Kiljunen (Parl.-FI). – Mr President, you underlined in your statement that the European Union is unique, representing a new type of decision-making. I agree. In essence it is supranational and goes beyond the states, although legitimated by the sovereign states. That is exactly why I hesitate using the words "federal" or "confederal". Both references tend in the wrong direction; both are related to forms of states. The European Union is not and will not be a state with full sovereignty. It represents a new type of power format reflecting shared sovereignty. In using the word "federal" we are making a reference to the Philadelphia Convention, which created a model for the federal state. We, however, are not creating a constitution for the United States of Europe.

Nevertheless, the Brussels Convention has the same historic potential as the Philadelphia Convention had to create something new – a model for a new type of power structure that is supranational, democratic, efficient and transparent. That is why we should not, in face of our historical challenge, use obsolete terms such as "federal" or "confederal". <BRK>

FR

Le Président. – Je vous remercie. Il y avait une remarque de Monsieur Duhamel qui était très juste. Elle concernait un point qui rend d'ailleurs un peu difficile la gestion de nos travaux. C'est que, par exemple, il y a beaucoup d'amendements qui proposent la suppression du mot "fédéral". Mais il y a tout ceux qui n'ont pas déposé d'amendement. Il faut rechercher où est l'équilibre. La parole est à Monsieur Roche. <BRK>

EN

Roche (Ch.E./G.-IE). – Those in favour may not have just been silent. The reality of it has been expressed by the last speaker. The word "federal" has a specific connotation. The European Union is a fundamentally different type of device. It has a fundamentally different way of doing business. It is a supranational organisation brought together by equal states pooling sovereignty, but it is not a super-state and decidedly is not a federal super-state.

Article 1 is of fundamental importance. At one stage you spoke of a certain lyrical introduction to the Union. I believe that Article 1 should be very precise. I have suggested that in Article 1(1) we remove the second half of the second clause. This is where you use the word "federal".

You made the point that the use of the word "federal" in this particular context is a description of process, not necessarily a description of the Union itself. It is a fundamental mistake to introduce the word "federal", which has a specific historical connotation which is not an accurate reflection of what this Union is about.

The nature of this Union is not going to be described by a word. It will be prescribed by the treaty. We should be happy to leave it to be prescribed by the treaty rather than using words that are appropriate for a different type of arrangement. <BRK>

EN

MacLennan of Rogart (Parl.-GB). – Mr President, you have specifically invited us to comment upon the inclusion of the word "federal". I wish to say that it is an appropriate description of how the Union reaches many of its decisions. It is about process, as you have said. I adopt the reasoning advanced by Mr De Villepin in his speech. However, where I part company with him is in what he had to say about the use of the words "ever closer union". They have a historical resonance within the Union because they describe how we have got to where we are, from quite small beginnings. However, we must ask ourselves, at this stage, whether they are appropriate when we are seeking an establishment, an embracing constitution, that we wish to be long-lasting. We do not want to create uncertainties about its purposes or its processes. That historically resonant phrase of "ever closer union" is neither precise nor lacking in anxiety-creation. Therefore, if it is to be included at all – and there is some support for it – it would be appropriate for the preamble of the constitution, but not for the body.

On the issue of the individual characteristic of the Union, its diversity, I hope that its cultural diversity will be reflected both in the statement of values and in the statement of objectives in Articles 2 and 3. <BRK>

ES

Borrell Fontelles (Parl.-ES). – Señor Presidente, creo que entre los valores de la Unión es imprescindible colocar el de la igualdad. La igualdad es una característica fundamental de la historia de Europa, no sólo la igualdad entre hombre y mujer, que es una de las dimensiones de la igualdad, pero que no agota su múltiple sentido. No me parece posible que los europeos hagamos una Constitución y que entre sus valores no proclamemos el de la igualdad, que al mismo título que la libertad, está profundamente anclada en nuestra historia colectiva. Igualdad, en particular, entre hombre y mujer, pero igualdad. Que no nos falte esta palabra en el artículo 2.

La dimensión social de Europa debe quedar reforzada, muchos lo han dicho, entre sus objetivos. Los objetivos de la Unión no son sólo crear una economía competitiva y próspera, sino también crear una sociedad cohesionada. Hay que dar a esta palabra todo su significado en el artículo 3.

En el artículo 1, la palabra federal. Nos guste o no -ya hemos chocado con la magia de las palabras- tanto si figura como si no figura, esta palabra será un elemento mediático, característico de nuestro trabajo. Federar quiere decir unir en la libertad y eso es lo que es Europa, una unión en la libertad. De cuando en cuando conviene enterrar los fantasmas, los fantasmas que anidan en el subconsciente colectivo de los pueblos, y proclamar que Europa, para muchas de las cosas que queremos hacer juntos, tiene que trabajar de un modo federal. Il faut appeler un chat un chat. No hay que tener miedo a que las palabras reflejen la realidad, y una parte de la realidad europea es federal. Si esa palabra se cae y no figura en nuestra Constitución, para mucha gente habrá significado un importante paso atrás. <BRK>

Berès (PE). – Merci, Monsieur le Président. Je veux revenir aussi sur ce mot "fédéral". Je crois que nous en avons besoin dans la Constitution. Il correspond à la réalité de l'exercice de certains pouvoirs au sein de l'Union européenne et une grande majorité de nos concitoyens attendent de nous la capacité de mettre en œuvre une vraie fédération. Alors, à tout le moins, ne supprimons pas cette référence au terme "fédéral".

A l'article 2, je crains que nous ouvrons à nouveau deux débats qui ont été tranchés par la Charte. Le premier lorsque vous faites référence à la notion de droits de l'homme. Nous avons eu ce débat dans la Charte et le terme "droits de l'homme" ne figure pas dans la Charte à juste titre. Nous avons simplement utilisé l'expression "dignité humaine" et "droits fondamentaux". Je vous en prie, au nom de beaucoup de femmes, mais aussi d'hommes, d'en rester à cet équilibre atteint dans la Charte.

A propos de Dieu, vous nous interrogez, et là aussi, Monsieur le Président, je veux vous dire que ce débat, nous l'avons eu de façon très approfondie à l'occasion de la rédaction de la Charte. Il me semble que l'équilibre auquel nous sommes parvenus est le bon équilibre. Nous devons garantir la liberté des Eglises, la liberté de conscience, la non-discrimination. Mais ce n'est pas l'objet de cet article 2. L'article 2 est celui qui définit nos valeurs. Il a vocation à installer l'organisation de la démocratie européenne, de l'organisation du pouvoir temporel et non pas la place du pouvoir spirituel.

Dernier mot, à propos de l'article 3, Monsieur le Président, vous n'avez pas fait référence à certains amendements qui, à l'article 3.5, proposent que le respect des objectifs de l'Union soit une obligation pour l'ensemble des institutions de l'Union. Je crois que ce serait une contribution très importante et j'espère que le praesidium pourra réexaminer ce point. Merci Monsieur le Président. <BRK>

Le Président. – Nous avons hésité à mettre, en effet, l'expression "respect des droits de l'homme". Et nous connaissons les arguments que vous venez de développer et ce n'est pas, en effet, le texte qui figure dans la Charte des Droits fondamentaux. Mais c'est une expression du langage courant mondial. Par exemple, lorsque vous avez dans tel ou tel grand pays asiatique des situations de ce type, on invoque le respect des Droits de l'homme. On retombe sur le problème que soulevait Monsieur Borrell, à savoir l'expression verbale des choses. On peut ne pas le mettre mais c'est une expression qui dans la conscience internationale a une signification par elle-même. Et naturellement, ce n'est pas incompatible avec les autres valeurs dont vous parlez. Nous nous interrogerons à nouveau et nous notons cette remarque ainsi d'ailleurs que la dernière.

Nous reprenons la liste des orateurs. La parole est à Monsieur Demiralp et à Madame Maij-Weggen ensuite. <BRK>

Demiralp (Gouv.-TR). – Merci Monsieur le Président. Nous avons proposé des amendements concernant les projets d'article 1,2,3, et 5. Je me permets de faire quelques remarques supplémentaires.

Depuis longtemps, on s'interroge sur la pertinence des notions de fédération et de confédération pour qualifier l'Union européenne. En réalité, elle est plus qu'une confédération mais pas tout à fait une entité fédérale. Tout au plus, comme vous le dites, elle gère sur le modèle fédéral certaines compétences communes. Mais elle gère d'autres compétences sur le modèle intergouvernemental. Je pense qu'au stade actuel de nos travaux, il faut dépasser cette opposition conceptuelle. Il serait judicieux de réajuster ces mêmes catégories afin de leur faire acquérir la plasticité nécessaire. C'est ainsi que l'on pourrait procéder à une solution d'amalgame entre ces deux notions. L'Union européenne, à l'avenir, serait appelée une fédération des Etats-nations, ce qui équivaldrait à admettre la coexistence de deux niveaux de souveraineté, européenne et nationale, ce qui correspond mieux à la réalité de l'Union européenne.

Par ailleurs, Monsieur le Président, la lecture parallèle de l'article 1 alinéa 3 et de l'article 2 est de nature à prêter confusion quant à la signification de la notion de valeur. Je pense qu'il est essentiel qu'il ressorte de la lecture de ces articles qu'il s'agit bien des mêmes valeurs. Afin de mieux souligner cet aspect, j'ai proposé qu'on fasse une référence explicite à l'article 2, dans l'article 1 alinéa 3.

Monsieur le Président, la liberté de conscience et le principe de non-discrimination sont parmi les piliers de l'Europe moderne, créés comme modèle universel. Réintroduire la religion dans le texte de la Constitution, qui sera d'ailleurs un texte justiciable, comme un aspect de l'identité européenne, serait en contradiction non seulement avec la liberté de conscience et le principe de non-discrimination, mais aussi avec le progrès enregistré par l'Europe depuis le siècle des Lumières. C'est la laïcité qui fut la force motrice de ce progrès. Merci Monsieur le Président. <BRK>

Maij-Weggen (PE). - Voorzitter, in de eerste plaats wil ik u steunen daar waar u gepleit hebt voor een intensivering van onze werkzaamheden en niet voor een verlenging van de werkzaamheden. Ik denk dat een intensivering ons helpt om op tijd ons werk af te leveren.

Dan, Voorzitter, een opmerking over het begrip federaal. Er zijn veel mensen die hier zeggen dat je dat begrip niet zou moeten opnemen. Ik hoor dat u daarover een stuk of tien, vijftien amendementen hebt gekregen. Maar dat betekent altijd nog dat er zo'n 80 mensen hier vinden dat het wèl opgenomen zou moeten worden. In de twee voorvergaderingen die ik heb bijgewoond, heb ik vastgesteld dat een meerderheid eigenlijk vond dat het moest blijven. Wij steunen dus die benadering om het federaal aspect in artikel 1 onder te brengen.

Dan, Voorzitter, artikel 2. Daar hebben ook wij een amendement ingediend om die gelijke behandeling op te nemen. Ik denk dat het erg belangrijk is omdat die gelijke behandeling dan ook verwijst naar de gelijke behandeling van mannen en vrouwen, en dat wordt door meer dan de helft van onze burgers als een heel belangrijke waarde gezien van de Europese Unie. Dus, Voorzitter, ik zou graag willen dat dat zou blijven.

Voorzitter, het aspect religie. Ik behoor tot de indieners van dat amendement maar ik vind het niet onverstandig om dit onder te brengen in de preamble. Als we daarover een consensus kunnen vinden, dan is dat wat mij betreft een goede oplossing.

Dan artikel 3. Ik behoor ook tot degenen die het aspect sociale markteconomie hebben ingebracht. Dat is toch wel een heel centrale Europese waarde die door de twee grootste politieke partijen ook warm wordt ondersteund. De Verenigde Staten staan altijd voor een vrije markteconomie. De oude Sovjetunie was een geleide markteconomie maar Europa heeft vanouds een sociale markteconomie, en laten we dat ook maar opnemen. Verder steunen we ook diegenen die hebben gezegd dat het aspect milieubescherming en duurzaamheid moet worden ingebracht. Misschien kun je het allemaal wel samenvatten onder de term sociaal-ecologische markteconomie. Dan heb je in een hele korte bewoording precies gezegd waar het hier om gaat.

Ten slotte, Voorzitter, behoor ik tot diegenen die absoluut vinden dat het Handvest ondergebracht moet worden in het constitutionele gedeelte van het Verdrag. Ik denk dat dat heel belangrijk is. Ik heb begrepen dat u er misschien een hoofdstuk 2 van wilt maken. Voorzitter, dat heeft mijn warme ondersteuning. Ik zie dat ik maar 1 minuut heb gesproken maar dat klopt niet want de klok ging niet aan aan het begin van mijn spreektijd. Dus ik heb echt mijn twee minuten wel vol gemaakt. <BRK>

Follini (Parl.-IT). - Signor Presidente, era inevitabile che i primi articoli portassero con sé anche le prime critiche, e ad alcune di queste mi associo anch'io, convinto che qualche dissenso leale aiuti di più che non un'adesione svogliata e poco convinta. Vorrei però, prima di tutto, segnalare un punto di consenso. Credo sia giusto il richiamo al carattere federale dell'Unione europea: la costruzione europea è la conseguenza di diverse architetture, ha aspetti federali e aspetti confederali, combina i diritti dei popoli e degli Stati, la sovranità comune dell'Unione e quella propria dei singoli paesi, ma la preminenza della caratteristica federale è il pilastro principale di questa costruzione.

Vengo ora al punto più difficile: molti di noi hanno richiamato l'esigenza che l'Europa non dimentichi le sue radici, il suo retaggio. Io sono tra questi. Questa esigenza può essere sottolineata nell'articolo 2 - quello relativo ai valori - o, forse in modo più appropriato, nel preambolo, e potrà essere ancora più concretamente ribadita quando si dovrà affrontare la questione, finora irrisolta, del rapporto istituzionale, del dialogo strutturale con le confessioni religiose. Non possiamo dimenticare il valore anche civile di questa spiritualità e, nello stesso tempo, non possiamo opporre questo valore al principio della laicità delle istituzioni. Io milito, nel mio paese, in un partito che nasce da un'ispirazione religiosa e che, nello stesso tempo, riconosce il confine che divide sfera politica e sfera spirituale. Da cattolico so bene che la laicità dello Stato è un'idea tipicamente cristiana, nasce dalla distinzione tra quanto è dovuto a Dio e quanto è dovuto a Cesare. Quello che appartiene alla mia coscienza non sempre coincide con quello che appartiene allo Stato o, in questo caso, alla federazione degli Stati. E' ovvio anche che questo confine non può nascondere il grande debito che tutto il nostro continente ha verso la tradizione religiosa e, tanto più, nell'aver propiziato le condizioni che hanno portato alla riunificazione.

Da parte mia confido che i molti emendamenti presentati su questo punto e la saggezza con cui se ne terrà conto ci aiuteranno a trovare il giusto equilibrio tra questi valori spirituali e la doverosa autonomia delle istituzioni pubbliche. <BRK>

Carey (Parl.-IE). – Mr President, you said that the document that will be produced at the end of this process should be understandable even to school-going students. While it might be legible, it will be interpreted by lawyers. Therefore it is important that we spend a good deal of time getting the early part of it right.

I agree with what Commissioner Vitorino said earlier: that in simplifying these treaties we should not in any way be tempted to roll back on values and rights that were strongly established in previous Treaties.

I see no compelling reason for not agreeing at an early stage that the title of the Union will be "the European Union". It is a brand name that has been broadly accepted. It is a consumer-friendly name. We should stick with it.

You invited us to have a debate on the heritage of the Union. It is important that we find a formulation that reflects the different cultural traditions that have underpinned the states of Europe over the years. I would like to contribute to finding that formulation.

I support the amendments offered in writing by my colleague Mr Roche. I want to raise a number of points. In relation to Article 1, I suggest that the Union should not only respect the national identities but also the sovereignty of Member States. I support the deletion of the word "federal" because of its connotations and its lack of agreed meaning.

In relation to values, they need to be very precise in Article 2. I suggest the values should include fundamental freedoms, which is the language used in the current Treaty. In relation to Article 3(4), we should spell out the Union's objectives in the wider world, using the language agreed in the External Action Working Group.

We should be guided by the working groups' reports on what is agreed or not agreed, particularly by the Economic Governance Working Group, for example, where there was not agreement on issues such as taxation, or the document on Social Europe, on which there was significant consensus. <BRK>

Lequiller (Parl.-FR). – Monsieur le Président, sur la crise internationale, je voudrais souligner mon total accord avec votre déclaration liminaire. Devant la division de l'Europe, les conventionnels doivent et peuvent tirer d'un mal un bien. Nous devons non pas baisser les bras, mais au contraire redoubler d'efforts pour donner une voix unique, un bras armé commun, une volonté commune à l'Europe.

L'opinion européenne jamais aussi sensibilisée qu'aujourd'hui sur le contexte international, ne comprendrait pas que l'on ne fasse pas ici le choix de l'ambition et ce, avant juin prochain. Prenons garde sinon de la sévérité avec laquelle l'opinion jugerait notre travail, qui s'ajouterait à la sévérité avec laquelle elle juge aujourd'hui la désunion européenne.

Sur notre sujet d'aujourd'hui, je voudrais vous dire, Monsieur le Président, mon soutien d'une part, aux éléments clés proposés par le praesidium que constituent les dispositions de l'article 1, relatives à la double souveraineté des Etats et des peuples d'Europe et à la gestion, sur le mode fédéral, de certaines compétences communes et d'autre part, sur la personnalité juridique unique.

Je proposerai quelques amendements. Il me paraît indispensable, comme l'a dit Dominique De Villepin, de maintenir dans le texte de la Constitution à l'article 1, les termes d'Union sans cesse plus étroite. Il me semble que revenir sur cette disposition, qui figurait dans le Traité de Rome, constituerait un signal négatif. Dans le même esprit, il me semble nécessaire d'inscrire à l'article 1, le principe de solidarité entre les Etats membres, qui constitue le fondement des politiques communes.

En second lieu, plusieurs de mes amendements visent à renforcer dans le texte les bases du projet de société. Je propose ainsi d'insérer le texte de la Charte au début de la Constitution pour plus de portée politique et symbolique. Je propose de renforcer les objectifs de l'Union en matière culturelle, en indiquant que l'Union favorise la diversité culturelle et linguistique.

Enfin, il convient de compléter les dispositions relatives aux objectifs de l'Union dans le monde en faisant expressément référence aux Droits de l'homme, à la diversité culturelle, à la préservation de l'environnement et des ressources naturelles. Je vous remercie Monsieur le Président. <BRK>

Baroness Scotland of Asthal (Ch.E/G.-GB). – I agree with Mr Roche that the first articles of this constitution will tell the reader about the kind of European Union we are creating. I applaud the efforts of the Secretariat to communicate this in plain language that we can all understand. But as a lawyer and government minister, I need to go a step further and say that we need not only clarity; we also need to know that our constitution is written in a way that gives us legal certainty. This might mean that we need to do further work on these provisions in a different forum. I welcome the suggestion that we have two further meetings. I look forward to the further proposals from the Praesidium and others as to how we might do this.

The tone of the opening articles should tell the citizens about the genesis of the Union, that its powers come from the Member States, and why they have decided to pool sovereignty. For some, the word "federal" will do that, but it is a politically charged word. I hope we might find a better formula. I suggest we simply explain what we mean. We should coordinate certain policies at a European level to achieve goals that Member States cannot achieve alone.

On values and objectives, these articles will be used by the courts to interpret the treaty and must, therefore, reflect the competences of the Union. Higher-level aspirations might find their place in a political preamble. Personally, I would very much welcome that. Values and objectives should be easily distinguishable from each other. Values should be those on which our Union is founded: human dignity, liberty, democracy, the rule of law and respect for human rights. Objectives should be grouped in a way that reflects the substance of the current pillars. This will give coherence and help the general reader. These objectives will then need to be re-examined in the light of specific policy divisions in part 2. The objectives must reflect competences rather than aspirations.

The objectives should also note the Union's respect for the diversity of Member States – I was very pleased to hear a number of people say that – and the richness this brings to the Union.

This will give a flavour of the unique nature of the Union, the result of freely given cooperation and integration in pursuit of clearly-defined aims against a background of shared values. <BRK>

Athanasίου (Parl.-RO). – Monsieur le Président, chers collègues, je voudrais premièrement faire deux remarques générales. La première, que cette masse significative des amendements me rend optimiste. Parce que je suis convaincu que nous finirons nos travaux dans le délai prévu.

En second lieu, je voudrais dire que je soutiens pleinement toutes les observations du groupe social-démocrate et socialiste qui ont déjà été faites.

En troisième lieu, je voudrais m'arrêter sur des questions très concrètes. Premièrement, je souhaiterais parler du fédéralisme, de la méthode fédérale. Je vais expédier le problème parce qu'il s'agit d'un sujet extrêmement délicat comme on dit dans les milieux français, mais qui doit être abordé avec sagesse et froidement. Et je crois, comme disait Paul Valéry, que nous parlons de supprimer l'expression "fédéral" au moment où l'Europe communautaire, l'Union européenne agit sur le mode fédéral dans beaucoup de domaines. C'est pour cela que je crois qu'on peut emprunter l'expression de Paul Valéry qui disait que le loup est fait de mouton assimilé. Donc, je crois qu'à cet égard, nous devons être extrêmement rigoureux en nous prononçant sur les institutions, sur les compétences parce que ça c'est le problème de la méthode fédérale. Je crois qu'on ne peut pas, en supprimant un mot ici, ne pas voir une réalité quotidienne de l'action européenne de l'Union en ce moment.

En ce qui concerne l'article 1.2, je crois qu'on ne peut modifier le mot respect que par le mot garantie. Je crois que c'est plus juridique. L'Union garantit l'identité nationale des Etats membres parce que le respect est toujours un mot familier.

En ce qui concerne l'article 2, je soutiens la formule d'introduire le principe d'égalité entre les femmes et les hommes et je crois que nous pouvons dire aussi que l'Union vise non seulement à pratiquer la tolérance, la justice, la solidarité sociale, mais aussi le progrès qui a caractérisé toute l'histoire de l'Europe - progrès à travers l'éducation permanente et la recherche scientifique.

Enfin, je voudrais que l'Europe ne joue jamais en défensive. C'est pour cela que je veux vous suggérer à l'article 3.4 de remplacer "défendre son indépendance et ses intérêts" qui me paraît très défensif par "faire valoir son indépendance et ses intérêts". Le texte coule dans le sens où il est rédigé.

Enfin, je conclus en disant que, comme disait Monsieur Fischer, je crois que notre Convention a réussi à faire le parcours que l'Europe a fait afin de donner l'équilibre des pouvoirs à la démocratie, à la tolérance en une voix politique unitaire. C'est là notre démarche et notre avenir. <BRK>

Donc, chaque fois que vous prolongez un peu, vous renvoyez un de vos collègues à la session suivante. Balázs (Gouv.-HU). – Merci Monsieur le Président. La coïncidence heureuse des débuts des travaux de la Convention avec la fin des négociations sur l'élargissement de l'Union offrent une possibilité unique pour relier le renouveau de l'Union avec son extension. A la formulation des principes de base, nous devrions donc prendre en considération certaines normes dont l'application avait fait preuve d'utilité lors du long processus d'élargissement.

Premièrement, les critères d'adhésion définis à Copenhague en 93 devraient trouver leur place au début du Traité constitutionnel en relation étroite avec la possibilité d'adhésion d'autres Etats européens, article 1.3, et aussi avec les valeurs fondamentales.

Deuxièmement, les identités multicolores en Europe sont chères à ses citoyens et le Traité garantit le respect de ces identités. N'oublions pas que, surtout dans la partie est de notre continent, Etats et nations ne sont pas nécessairement et toujours identiques. Des centaines de milliers, voire des millions, de Polonais, Serbes, Russes, Roumains, Hongrois et autres vivent comme minorité nationale en dehors des frontières des Etats qui portent leur nom. Pour cette raison, l'identité nationale appartient aux peuples et personnes, et non seulement aux Etats comme il est formulé sous le point 2 de l'article 1.

Troisièmement, plus l'unité de l'Union est manifestée par l'application de la méthode communautaire, par l'extension du vote à la majorité qualifiée ou par le renforcement de sa personnalité juridique, plus il faut rassurer ceux qui ont des craintes, ouvertes ou cachées, au sujet de la limitation de l'exercice de leur souveraineté nationale. Cette constatation est valable en particulier chez ceux qui ont regagné leur souveraineté nationale au cours des dix dernières années. C'est une raison supplémentaire pour considérer la participation égale des nouveaux Etats membres à la Convention à partir de la signature du Traité d'adhésion le 16 avril prochain. Merci Monsieur le Président. <BRK>

Van der Linden (Parl.-NL). - Voorzitter, ik zou mij allereerst graag willen aansluiten bij diegenen die gepleit hebben voor een steeds hechtere samenwerking, omdat het een acquis is van de Europese Unie en het zou een verkeerd signaal zijn als dat niet het geval zou zijn.

Op de tweede plaats zou ik willen spreken van "burgers" in plaats van "volkeren" omdat de nationale staten eigenlijk de volkeren representeren, en het gaat hier toch meer om de burgers.

Op de derde plaats wil ik me graag aansluiten bij diegenen die ervoor gepleit hebben om het woord "federaal" te handhaven. Mijn hoofdpunt is eigenlijk dat wij het Handvest moeten zien als het hart en de ziel van de nieuwe grondwet. Dat is ook het geval bij de nationale grondwetten. Ik zou tegen die achtergrond er nog een keer aan willen herinneren dat Laken zowel het opnemen van het Charter in het basisverdrag alsook het toetreden tot EVRM als twee aan elkaar gekoppelde zaken heeft neergezet. En ook de werkgroep-Vitorino heeft op dat punt geen misverstand laten bestaan.

Nu deze tekst de kernformule bevat, betekent dat dat er grote risico's bestaan. Immers, er is unanimité noodzakelijk voor enige toekomstige beslissing van de Europese Raad met betrekking tot onderhandelingen over de modaliteiten van de toetreding. Dat betekent dat één enkele lidstaat in de toekomst dat proces zou kunnen blokkeren cq., zou kunnen vertragen en daarmee zou de koppeling van de twee, namelijk aan de ene kant het integraal onderdeel van de constitutie en aan de andere kant de toetreding tot EVRM, geblokkeerd kunnen worden. Daarom sluit ik me graag aan bij al diegenen die een amendement hebben ingediend om daar meer zekerheid over te geven en het woord "can" ofwel door "shall" ofwel door "commits itself to" ofwel "shall request to accede" te vervangen omdat er nu naar mijn oordeel zekerheid moet bestaan met betrekking tot de toetreding tot het EVRM-Verdrag. Het kan niet zo zijn dat wij in het Europa dat wij dichter bij de burgers willen brengen, het hart en de ziel, namelijk de plichten en de rechten van de burgers, want daar gaat het in belangrijk mate om, ergens via een bypass aan het Verdrag hechten. Daarom pleit ik ervoor om dat een integraal onderdeel te laten zijn van de constitutie en eventueel als compromis hoofdstuk 2 te reserveren voor het integrale Charter.

Tot slot, artikel 3, lid 4. Daar zou ik graag, zeker na de interventie van minister van buitenlandse zaken van Duitsland de heer Fischer, toegevoegd willen zien dat de Europese Unie ook een bijdrage levert aan de internationale rechtsorde. In de huidige actualiteit lijkt het mij geen overbodige luxe dat de Europese Unie ook een bijdrage levert aan het handhaven van de spelregels van de internationale rechtsorde. <BRK>

Le Président. – Je voudrais faire une remarque concernant le mot "peuple" et le mot "citoyen". Le mot "citoyen" est une expression politique à laquelle s'attachent des droits, généralement civiques ou électoraux. Il faut penser que la population, c'est autre chose. Dans la population, il y a les enfants, il y a des gens qui ne sont pas organisés ou qui n'ont pas de droits reconnus. Par conséquent, ce n'est pas neutre de dire "peuple" ou de dire "citoyen". Si vous prenez "citoyen", vous prenez ceux qui ont une expression politique, des droits politiques. Si vous prenez "peuple", vous prenez tout le monde, la communauté humaine européenne. Dès lors, il faudra voir quelle est l'expression la plus adéquate pour un sujet de ce type. Nous tiendrons compte, bien entendu, de votre avis. Le prochain orateur est Monsieur Michel. Ensuite, nous prendrons des cartons bleus. <BRK>

Michel (Ch.E/G.-BE). – Monsieur le Président, pour commencer je voudrais, parlant des événements internationaux actuels, y voir, comme vous, un motif très puissant pour nourrir une ambition commune très forte. Ainsi, nos conclusions doivent, de mon point de vue, refléter cette ambition. Sur le fond, je me bornerai à quelques points, en référence aux amendements que j'ai déposés avec d'autres conventionnels belges.

Premièrement, sur le premier article, il me paraît essentiel que le caractère dynamique de la construction européenne soit consacré. La référence à la perspective d'une Union sans cesse plus étroite doit, dans ces conditions, y figurer. Par ailleurs, en adoptant la Constitution, les Etats membres conféreront des compétences à l'Union. C'est toutefois l'Union qui exercera les compétences qui lui sont ainsi attribuées et c'est donc l'Union qui doit, par l'intermédiaire de ses institutions, coordonner les politiques et non comme l'indique le projet d'article 1, les Etats membres. Il va de soi que la suppression du mot "fédéral" n'a guère de sens. Ce serait, de mon point-de-vue, un pas en arrière.

(L'orateur poursuit en néerlandais)

Ten tweede, met betrekking tot de artikelen 2 en 3: de waarden en de doelstellingen van de Europese Unie moeten duidelijk van elkaar worden onderscheiden. De eerste vormen de grondslag voor het optreden van de Unie, de tweede betreffen de doelstellingen ervan. Gelijkheid, gerechtigheid, verdraagzaamheid en solidariteit moeten tot deze waarden behoren. Daarentegen moeten de veiligheid van de Unie, de bescherming van het leefmilieu, de strijd tegen maatschappelijke uitsluiting en tegen discriminatie, het bevorderen van gelijkheid tussen man en vrouw en de toegang voor allen tot kwalitatieve diensten van algemeen belang tot de doelstellingen behoren.

(L'orateur poursuit en français)

Je suis heureux que le praesidium n'ait pas inscrit de référence à un héritage religieux au titre des valeurs. Nous devons, bien entendu, assurer les libertés religieuses mais l'Europe n'est ni monoreligieuse ni monoculturelle et son modèle est fondé sur l'impartialité de l'Etat. Il ne serait ni sage ni juste d'introduire un élément qui donnerait à penser que l'on a une lecture partielle de l'histoire européenne.

Troisièmement, la Charte ne peut être reléguée dans un document annexe. J'opte donc résolument pour son intégration dans une seconde partie de la Constitution. Il conviendra, dès lors, d'éviter que la première partie de la Constitution, s'agissant de la citoyenneté ou de la non-discrimination, ne répète des droits qui figurent déjà dans la Charte. C'est précisément l'objet de nos amendements.

Quatrièmement, je suis évidemment favorable à ce que l'Union adhère à la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme. J'ajoute qu'il faudra aussi prévoir dans la Constitution une base juridique permettant d'adhérer à d'autres instruments de protection des droits fondamentaux. Je vous remercie. <BRK>

Abitbol (PE). – Monsieur le Président, de temps en temps, en écoutant les débats d'aujourd'hui, notamment les interventions du ministre allemand, du ministre français et encore du ministre belge des Affaires étrangères, je me dis qu'il faudra peut-être remplacer méthode communautaire par méthode Coué. Je ne sais pas comment cela se traduit dans les autres langues, mais en français, il me semble que la méthode Coué a fait aujourd'hui de grands progrès. A l'évidence, nos débats ont quelque chose d'assez surréaliste dans le climat actuel. Je vous rappelle quand même que le 17 de ce mois, une décision a été prise au Conseil européen. Une semaine plus tard, lundi dernier, au Conseil des ministres, on a eu une décision contraire ou une absence de décision et la division a été manifeste.

Pour en revenir à la Constitution, il y a un mot qui me choque beaucoup dans le projet. Il se trouvait déjà d'ailleurs dans les Traités précédents et j'ai entendu avec plaisir de nombreux orateurs, venant d'ailleurs d'horizons différents, proposer de le supprimer et de le remplacer par "souveraineté". Il s'agit du mot "identité nationale". Vous disiez vous-même, Monsieur le Président, que nous faisons un texte de droit public. Mais l'identité nationale n'est pas un terme de droit public. Elle n'existe, à ma connaissance, dans aucune Constitution, pas dans la française. Qu'est ce que l'identité nationale des Etats membres? Est-ce la baguette pour les uns, le chapeau tyrolien pour les autres? Il me semble qu'il y a un concept juridique qui est la souveraineté. Cette souveraineté restera en toute hypothèse pour l'ensemble des domaines politiques propres aux Etats membres. Il me semble que remplacer "identité", qui en outre, est un mot, en tout cas dans le vocabulaire politique français, assez connoté ethnique, par le mot "souveraineté" ne devrait choquer aucun des conventionnels. <BRK>

Duff (PE). – I was anxious to respond to those who say that they wish to insist that we make it clear that Member States confer the power that the Union enjoys. That is quite correct and we should say that, but it is not the end of the story. The fact is that the Union is greater than the sum of its parts and that the genius that we have created for ourselves over the last fifty years has established a federal authority that finds and articulates the common interest of all the Member States. That is why, feeling more self-assured about the exercise of power at a federal level, we are changing from a treaty system to a proper constitution. We should not be shy of what we have achieved. I can see no reason for being defensive, and absolutely every reason for speaking the truth in the clearest possible way. That includes the use of the word "federal". <BRK>

Barnier (CE). – Merci Monsieur le Président. A propos de l'ambiance dans laquelle nous travaillons et les bruits de guerre qui nous entourent, je trouve comme vous, tout comme beaucoup de ceux qui se sont exprimés, qu'il est très important que le signal qui sort aujourd'hui de cette Convention soit un signal de volontarisme et non pas de résignation ou de fatalisme. Et c'est bien l'ambiance que j'entends et que j'écoute avec beaucoup de satisfaction. Le volontarisme vaut pour les délais dans lesquels nous travaillons et qu'il nous faut respecter. Il vaut aussi sur le fond du projet auquel nous travaillons, y compris dans les aspects qui sont aujourd'hui, dans les Traités, les plus incertains ou les plus imparfaits. Je pense à la politique étrangère de sécurité commune qui est interpellée par la crise irakienne et l'aspect de la défense qui a justifié l'amendement que je me suis permis de présenter.

Il faut aller plus loin, tirer les leçons de cette crise, mais tout d'abord, ne pas revenir en arrière. Et voilà pourquoi j'accueille avec beaucoup de faveur de nombreux amendements qui préservent l'acquis et le modèle communautaires dans les valeurs, les principes et les politiques. Cette réflexion rejoint celle que plusieurs ont faite de réécrire peut-être cette belle phrase qui figure dans le Traité et selon laquelle nous sommes dans une Union sans cesse plus étroite. En effet, quand on est dans une Union sans cesse plus étroite, c'est qu'on n'accepte pas de revenir en arrière.

Je terminerai en parlant du mot "fédéral" qui suscite beaucoup de débats, Monsieur Anthanasiou en a parlé avec beaucoup de sagesse tout à l'heure. Je veux simplement dire qu'il ne faut pas confondre ce mot avec un autre mot qui est celui de "centralisation". Nous avons des pratiques fédérales. Nous avons certaines compétences exercées de manière fédérale et c'est naturellement pour moi le principe de subsidiarité, dont le contrôle fait partie intégralement du modèle fédéral, qui sera au cœur de notre Constitution. <BRK>

Van Lancker (PE). – Merci Monsieur le Président. J'ai levé mon carton bleu à l'occasion de l'intervention de Dominique de Villepin parce qu'il a plaidé pour l'intégration du respect des objectifs environnementaux dans toutes les politiques de l'Union. Je voudrais ajouter qu'il existe un article comparable, horizontal aussi, en matière d'égalité entre hommes et femmes dans l'article 3 paragraphe 2 de l'actuel Traité et dans le groupe de travail social, un grand nombre de Conventionnels a plaidé pour un caractère transversal de certains objectifs sociaux. C'est pour cela que je rejoins les propos qu'a déjà tenus Pervenche Berès et qui consistent à dire qu'il nous faut ajouter, dans l'article 3, un article transversal horizontal.

J'attire aussi votre attention sur les amendements introduits par les conventionnels belges où l'on lit par exemple que l'Union veille dans la définition et la mise en œuvre de ses politiques et actions à ce qu'elles soit compatibles entre elles et prennent en considération l'ensemble des objectifs de l'Union. Je crois qu'en défendant cette formulation, nous avons assuré la transversalité de certains objectifs de l'Union. Je vous remercie. <BRK>

Heathcoat-Amory (Parl.-GB). – On this federal business I disagree with Mr De Villepin and others who have asked for the phrase "federation of nation states" to be included, simply because it is a contradiction in terms. If one transfers powers to the centre, one is left with states in the American sense but not nation states as understood by the public. If we are trying to write something that is understandable by the public, let us use words in a way it will understand. It is a complete confusion. That phrase should certainly not find its way into the final product.

You, Mr President, used the phrase "high contracting parties". Again, this is not a phrase we should ever use in public. Nevertheless it is in Article 1 of both the existing Treaties - not in the preamble, but in Article 1 - to express an important truth that what we have created so far is a Union of Member States. It derives its powers from the Member States.

By contrast, Article 1 of the new treaty derives its powers not from Member States but from a constitution. That is a very big change, not described properly in the explanatory notes. It is a regrettable change. We therefore need to re-establish the existing relationship even if we avoid that rather awful phrase "high contracting parties". <BRK>

Brok (PE). - Herr Präsident! Herzlichen Dank für die Gelegenheit, hier einige Anmerkungen zu machen. Ich glaube, dass die Uneinigkeit, die Europa in den letzten Tagen und Wochen in der großen Frage von Krieg und Frieden gezeigt hat, kein Anlass für uns sein sollte, jetzt größere Schwierigkeiten zu sehen, sondern wir sollten sie als eine Chance begreifen. Ich habe den Eindruck, dass unsere Bürger schon sehr viel mehr über die Notwendigkeit europäischer Einigung verstanden haben, nämlich, dass Europa nur dann einen wirklichen Einfluss hat, wenn wir zusammenstehen, und dass das auch von den Regierungen langsam akzeptiert werden muss.

Aus diesem Grund möchte ich gleich auf einen Punkt in Artikel 1 zu sprechen kommen. Bisher ist die Union auf der Grundlage der Mitgliedstaaten aufgebaut. Jetzt wird gesagt, "der Mitgliedstaaten und der Völker". Ich würde sehr viel eher sagen, dass die Union auch auf der Grundlage der Bürger gegründet ist, der Staaten und der einzelnen Bürger. Ich glaube, dass das dem entsprechenden Anspruch näher kommt, zumal wir die Charta der Grundrechte in die Verfassung einarbeiten möchten, wo ja gerade der einzelne Bürger - das Individuum - eine Rolle spielt. Übrigens ist das aus unserer Sicht, der EVP, ein wichtiger Punkt. Wir hätten gerne, wenn diese Rechte des Bürgers und die Charta der Grundrechte am Anfang der Verfassung stünden. Ich glaube, darüber werden wir im Laufe der nächsten Wochen noch intensiv zu diskutieren haben.

In diesem Zusammenhang sind natürlich auch Fragen, die hier erörtert werden müssen, wie das Gleichheitsprinzip insgesamt und die Frage der Gleichheit der Geschlechter von großer Bedeutung, denn sie müssen in dieser Verfassung vorgesehen werden, aber es stellt sich aufgrund dieser Zuordnung natürlich die Frage, an welcher Stelle.

Herr Präsident, wir haben heute eine intensive Diskussion gehabt über den Begriff "föderal". Ich weiss, dass dieser Begriff in unseren Ländern eine unterschiedliche Bedeutung hat. Wir sollten darauf achten, dass wir uns nicht an Begriffen festbeißen und auf diese Art und Weise in der Sache womöglich nicht vorankommen. Aus meinem Verständnis - einem konföderal-europäischen Verständnis - von föderal heraus, das ja dezentral bedeutet, möchte ich deutlich machen, dass wir die Europäische Union auf einer föderalen Ordnung begründen möchten, in der es eine wirkliche Balance zwischen dem Gemeinschaftseuropa und den Gliedern gibt, um auf dieser Grundlage entsprechend voranzukommen, aber eben im Sinne dessen, was heute im Vertrag steht, nämlich einer immer engeren Union. Wir können feststellen, das ist ja auch ein Indiz dafür, dass die Europäische Union überall dort erfolgreich ist, wo sie als Gemeinschaftseuropa auftritt und überall da nicht erfolgreich ist, wo sie als intergouvernementales Europa auftritt. Das zeigt sich jetzt gerade auch im Bereich der Außen- und Sicherheitspolitik.

Wichtig für uns als Europäische Volkspartei ist es zweifellos, dass das religiöse und humanistische Erbe der Europäischen Union und der Gottesbezug einbezogen werden, und dass wir die Frage des Staat-Kirche-Verhältnisses wie auch die Beteiligung der Kirchen wie anderer Organisationen am strukturellen Dialog festgemacht wissen möchten.

Herr Präsident, in Artikel 3 sind eine Reihe von wichtigen Begriffen festgeschrieben. Wir möchten gern, dass die soziale Marktwirtschaft als eine tragende Formel in diese Verfassung aufgenommen wird. Die soziale Marktwirtschaft bringt die Balance zwischen den Notwendigkeiten sozialer Gerechtigkeit und den Entwicklungsfähigkeiten des Marktes mit sich. Der Markt muss die Leistungen erbringen, aus denen das Soziale finanziert wird. Auf der anderen Seite muss es auch Rahmenbedingungen geben, in denen der Markt stattfinden kann. Ich meine, dass der Begriff der sozialen Marktwirtschaft - verbunden natürlich mit Preisstabilität, inflationsfreiem Wachstum und Anderem - eine wesentliche Rolle spielt.

Lassen Sie mich noch zur Außen- und Sicherheitspolitik eine Bemerkung machen, zu den entsprechenden Artikeln 4 und 10. Ich meine, dass die Solidaritätsklausel in den Vertrag eingefügt werden sollte, aber als eine Option für die Glieder. Warum machen wir es nicht so, dass wir den Artikel 5 des WEU-Vertrages beispielsweise hinzufügen, es aber jedem einzelnen Mitgliedsland freigestellt wird, ihn zu unterzeichnen? Ich glaube, damit kommen wir in der Solidaritätsklausel einen entscheidenden Schritt weiter, aber wir überlassen es immer noch den Staaten, die sich bisher als nicht bündnisgebunden und neutral verstehen, diesem schrittweise zu folgen. Ich glaube, dass das für den Ratifikationsprozess auch den entsprechenden Ansatz darstellt. Dass wir allerdings eine solche Solidaritätsklausel anstreben müssen, dass wir im Bereich der Außen-, Sicherheits- und Verteidigungspolitik vorankommen müssen, zeigt nicht nur die gegenwärtige Krise, sondern auch eine langfristige Sicht.

Wir haben eine Europäische Union, die eine gemeinsame Währung hat, einen gemeinsamen Binnenmarkt, eine gemeinsame Rechtsordnung, die im Bereich der Rechts- und Innenpolitik zu gemeinsamen Positionen kommt und gemeinsam zu offenen Grenzen kommt.

Das heißt, wir haben eine Europäische Union, in der Angriffe auf einen Teil gegen die Interessen des Gesamten gerichtet sind, so wie wir dies früher von der Definition nur von einem Staat her kannten. Ich glaube, dass es von daher nicht akzeptabel ist, dass wir in Zukunft Regionen mit unterschiedlicher Qualität von Sicherheit in der Europäischen Union haben. Dass dies komplementär und in Zusammenarbeit mit der NATO zu geschehen hat - all das werden wir später noch intensiver zu erörtern haben -, versteht sich von selbst, das darf kein Widerspruch sein, denn es ist nicht finanzierbar und auch von der Sache her nicht sinnvoll. Es sollte gerade in diesen Tagen deutlich sein, dass wir durch eigene Fähigkeiten, schnelle Entscheidungsprozesse, die Einführung von

Mehrheitsentscheidungen im Bereich der Außenpolitik - damit ein Vakuum gefüllt werden kann - vorankommen können, weil dies die einzige Chance ist, Stärke zu beweisen, und diese allein macht uns fähig, wirklicher Partner der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika zu sein. Wenn das transatlantische Bündnis eine Chance hat, dann nur, wenn es auf einer partnerschaftlichen Basis fußt, aber dies liegt allein hier an uns in diesem Konvent! <BRK>

Le Président. – Nous revenons maintenant aux interventions d'une durée de deux minutes. La parole est à Monsieur Kirkhope. <BRK>

Kirkhope (PE). – The Laeken Declaration rightly stated that the EU should not intervene in matters by their nature best left to Member States. The reason for that is clear. If the Union intervenes in such areas people feel that their national identities are under threat. Therefore respect for national identity should be at the forefront of our minds when we consider the various drafts of the texts over the coming weeks.

I am extremely pleased at the Praesidium's draft of Article 1(2), which states that "the Union shall respect the national identities of its Member States". I have asked that this Article be amended to make it crystal clear that the Union will also respect their national sovereignties, however defined. If the Union does not respect the sovereignties, it cannot respect national identities and the future of the Union could be threatened.

The embodiment of national sovereignty is, in my view, the will of the people. That is why, through the convention process, I have gone to great lengths to stress the importance of elected institutions in the Union. The supremacy of national parliaments should be protected, both from unelected European institutions and also from over-zealous governments with too much executive power, as is the case in the UK at present. The European Parliament should play a bigger role in the European decision-making process.

For the same reason, I would urge fellow convention members to support my proposal for an additional Article 1(4), specifying that the people of each Member State shall be consulted by referenda, where permitted by national constitutions, before ratification of the final text of the convention by Member States' governments.

If the people, consulted in separate national referenda, unanimously support the final text of the convention, they will have no reason to feel that their national identities have been threatened.

Winston Churchill said: "Trust the people." That is terribly important in the work we are carrying out and the conclusions we reach. If we do not trust the people we risk losing their trust in us. <BRK>

Vanhanen (Parl.-FI). - Arvoisa puheenjohtaja, onnittelut puheenjohtajistolle siitä, että se on saanut ensimmäiset artikkelit hyvin tiiviiseen muotoon. Ensimmäiseen ja tärkeimpään artiklaan teen useita periaatteellisesti tärkeitä muutosehdotuksia. Ensimmäiseksi en halua käyttää uudesta sopimuksesta nimeä perustuslaki vaan perustuslain sopimus, jossa sana sopimus kuvaa asiakirjan luonnetta jäsenvaltioiden välisenä sopimuksena. Toiseksi on haettava muotoilu, jossa ei sanota, että unioni perustetaan nyt uudelleen, ja kolmanneksi en hyväksy mainintaa liittovaltion tapaan käytettävästä toimivallasta. Nykyisissä sopimuksissa ei ole tätä liittovaltioluonnehdintaa. Miksi se esitettäisiin nyt? Jos se otetaan mukaan, kertoisi se pyrkimyksestä muutokseen, joka herättäisi suuria ristiriitoja. Lisäksi haluan, että unionin arvoissa mainitaan tasa-arvo, vähemmistöjen oikeudet ja avoimuus. Unionin tavoiteartikla on määriteltävä siten, että se ei luettele sellaisia liian yleisiä tavoitteita, joihin unionin toimivalta ei ulotu. Tavoitteiden on oltava supusoinnussa toimivallan kanssa. <BRK>

Palacio Vallelersundi (Ch.E/G.-ES). -Señor Presidente, hoy la Convención entra en una nueva etapa, la etapa de redacción. Es una etapa importante y es un momento difícil. La imagen de Europa es sombría, pero como decía el Sr. Barnier hace un momento, nosotros no somos fotógrafos, somos visionarios, somos diseñadores, somos convencionales. Recordando las palabras del Presidente Giscard al comienzo de esta sesión, es verdad que se ciernen dudas y angustias sobre nuestra tarea, pero también decía el Presidente Giscard, que las situaciones complejas han servido de espoleta para fortalecer la construcción europea y daba el ejemplo de cómo nace el Consejo Europeo.

Hoy más que nunca la Convención es necesaria, hoy más que nunca la Convención es la respuesta, hoy más que nunca tenemos que estar a la altura y trabajar sin desmayo, con tenacidad, con esperanza; la tenacidad y la esperanza son el resultado del optimismo, atemperado por el conocimiento. La Convención tiene que servir de catalizador de las energías de nuestra Europa de 27 más 1, de esa Europa que queremos diseñar para los próximos decenios, una Europa ambiciosa y realista.

Y permítanme hablar de los fundamentos, de los valores; nuestra Europa tiene muy claras y muy fuertes señas de identidad: la democracia, la separación de la Iglesia y del Estado, el respeto de los derechos humanos, el imperio de la ley, la economía social de mercado. Eso es lo que se refleja de forma principal en estos primeros artículos y en la Carta que vamos a incorporar.

Estos principios y valores, los tenemos que combinar en una doble dirección: por una parte, la Convención tiene que dar un mensaje político, claro y fuerte, a la ciudadanía, y por lo tanto, tener una redacción asequible y una redacción clara, límpida; por otra parte, el resultado último de la Convención es un texto jurídico, justiciable ante los tribunales y por lo tanto habremos de incorporar el rigor jurídico.

Señor Presidente, hoy más que nunca son válidas las palabras del Presidente Giscard d'Estaing en una entrevista: la tarea de la Convención es conjugar lo imposible y lo necesario. <BRK>

Le Président. – Comme le président l'avait annoncé avant l'interruption et comme il n'y a pas de liste séparée d'orateurs sur les articles 5, 6 et 7, je vais, avant de donner la parole à l'orateur suivant, vous donner quelques indications sur la façon dont le praesidium a rédigé ces articles et voit les amendements tels qu'ils ont été déposés.

L'article 5 est l'article qui intègre la Charte dans la Constitution. Je pense que le praesidium a ici essayé de suivre très clairement le consensus qui s'était dégagé dans le groupe présidé par Antonio Vitorino en intégrant la Charte et l'adhésion de l'Union à la Charte des droits de l'homme de Strasbourg. En fait, quand nous voyons la plupart des amendements sur cet article 5, le point principal est de savoir à quel endroit nous mettrons la Charte dans le Traité. A la lumière des interventions entendues en séance publique, nous devons faire une proposition. Le praesidium a ouvert deux options mais il est clair que dans les interventions, il y en a aussi une troisième qui est celle de mettre la Charte au début du Traité constitutionnel. C'est donc un des points qu'il faudra trancher.

Dans les articles 6 et 7, je pense qu'il y a un point important à trancher. Il s'agit du fait que certains trouvent que ces articles font double emploi avec la Charte. Et donc, il y aura un choix à faire. Le praesidium les a maintenus du fait de leur très grande importance. Mais je pense effectivement qu'il faut prendre en considération la question de savoir si l'intégration de la Charte fait qu'on ne répète pas un certain nombre de choses dans d'autres parties du Traité constitutionnel. C'est donc un point sur lequel il sera important que vous vous exprimiez, ce que vous avez d'ailleurs déjà fait partiellement par voie d'amendements.

A l'article 6, nous nous sommes limités strictement au texte du Traité actuel. Dans les amendements se pose la question de savoir si cet article 6 est limité aux citoyens de l'Union ou bien s'il faut lui donner une portée plus large. Dans le Traité actuel, c'est clairement limité aux citoyens de l'Union. La question est également de savoir s'il faut étendre l'article à d'autres discriminations. C'est la voie qu'indiquent certains des amendements.

Le point sur le double emploi avec la Charte ou non se pose clairement, encore plus, dans l'article 7 sur la citoyenneté où il faut bien reconnaître que les points que nous avons cités sont effectivement redondants avec ceux de la Charte. Par conséquent, après avoir entendu l'assemblée plénière, il faudra que nous tranchions. C'est là un principe général qu'il faudra fixer. Il faudra voir si nous nous limitons à ce qu'il y a dans la Charte en ne répétant pas ailleurs ce qu'on y trouve déjà ou bien si nous croyons qu'au vu de leur importance, il faut répéter certains articles.

Voilà les éléments que je voulais vous présenter suite aux réflexions du praesidium. Je donne la parole à Monsieur Duff. <BRK>

Duff (PE). – I agree with all those who say that whatever we do, we should not retreat from the present state of integration. Article 2 of the Maastricht Treaty refers to the necessity of sustaining the acquis communautaire in full. This is dropped from the Praesidium's draft. I wonder if that is prudent.

We need to filter into Articles 3(2) and 3(3) the non-discrimination clause presently found in Article 13, and to insert in Article 3(5) the principle of transparency and good governance, which will appear with more precision further on. I should like us to refer also to culture in both Articles 2 and 3.

As far as the Charter is concerned, a second chapter, part 1, would be a visible and appropriate way of inserting it. Then, as Mr Dehaene has intimated, Article 7 could be radically shortened, simply referring to the existence of this concept of citizenship.

Concerning religion and Almighty God, he is responsible for bringing Christendom, Judaism and Islam graces, faith and duties, but he is not responsible for the flowering of liberal democracy and fundamental rights and therefore he should not appear in our constitution.

Amen.

Hjelm-Wallén (Ch.E/G.-SE). - Herr ordförande! Jag anser att det är nödvändigt att inledningsvis slå fast att det är medlemsstaterna som är fördragets herrar. Detta måste tydliggöras genom att vi talar om höga fördragslutande parter och om ett konstitutionellt fördrag. Fördraget kan naturligtvis kallas för konstitution i dagligt tal, men inledningsvis måste vi använda korrekta benämningar, som jag tycker bör återfinnas i artikel 1.

I denna diskussion har många använt beteckningen "federal". Det verkar dock som om det begreppet förvirrar mer än det klagör. Jag hoppas också att det nu är tydligt att vi står fast vid benämningen på vår union, nämligen att den skall heta Europeiska unionen och ingenting annat.

I artikel 1 vill jag också ha in skrivningar om öppenheten. Detta finns idag med i unionsfördraget i artikel 1 och med tanke på vad som sades i Laekendeklarationen om behovet av öppenhet, vore det illa om vi tog ett steg tillbaka i det avseendet. Jag utgår ifrån, som även Duff nämnde, att öppenheten kommer med och då redan i den första artikeln.

När det gäller artikel 2 tillhör jag dem som vill ha en skrivning om jämställdhet mellan kvinnor och män. Däremot vill jag inte ha in något om religion och Gud i fördraget - inte i denna artikel och ingen annanstans heller.

I artikel 3 tycker jag att miljön har fått en väl undanskymd plats. Det måste uttryckas tydligare vad vi vill när det gäller miljön, och vi har lämnat in skrivningar om det. Jag saknar vidare en del goda förslag som den sociala arbetsgruppen lämnade in, t.ex. rätten till gott arbete, lika möjligheter för minoriteter och barnens rättigheter. Jag tycker att det vore viktigt att få in detta i artikel 3. Genom artikel 3 hoppas jag också att vi skall kunna vara litet bredare ut mot världen och slå fast unionens öppenhet mot omvärlden, att vi skall vara aktiva i arbetet att bygga en bättre värld. <BRK>

Barnier (CE). – Monsieur le Président, comme vous nous y avez invité sur les articles suivants, je voudrais faire deux observations sur l'article 5 et l'article 6 et la question de la Charte. Nous avons sur cette question un problème politique et un problème juridique qu'il nous faut régler. Il nous faut les régler tous ensemble et en même temps.

Le problème politique est de, à partir du travail considérable qui a été fait pour la Charte, donner dans la Constitution à laquelle nous travaillons de la force et de la lisibilité à cette Charte vis-à-vis des citoyens. Ce serait un signe tangible pour démontrer, par un premier grand signal, que nous confirmons la Communauté de valeurs à laquelle nous appartenons ensemble. Voilà pourquoi, comme d'autres, comme le groupe de travail qu'a présidé Antonio Vitorino, je souhaite que cette Charte figure intégralement dans la Constitution et qu'elle ait une force contraignante. La meilleure place serait probablement, comme certains le souhaitent et comme je le souhaite moi-même, de la placer en partie 2 de la Constitution. Il faudrait que cette partie 2 soit spécifiquement toute la Charte.

Si on règle ainsi le problème politique vis-à-vis des citoyens, on ne règle pas pour autant le problème juridique qui est celui de la lutte contre la discrimination. Nous visons cette affaire à l'article 6. Je pense qu'il faut quand même, dans la première partie de la Constitution, avoir une base juridique que ne donne pas la Charte. En effet, précisément, cette Charte, telle qu'elle est rédigée, ne crée pas de compétences. Elle ne permet pas d'adopter des actes juridiques ou législatifs pour, si le cas se présente, et il se présentera, empêcher ou lutter contre les discriminations sur la base du sexe, de la race, de l'origine ethnique, de la religion, des convictions, du handicap ou de l'orientation sexuelle.

Par conséquent, ma recommandation serait d'intégrer la Charte dans la partie 2 de la Constitution, et régler de ce fait le problème politique, et de préserver la base juridique dont nous avons besoin, par l'article 6. Si nous ne le faisons pas, nous retombons sur un autre problème politique qui serait un recul par rapport à l'acquis communautaire qui, lui, permet, à l'article 12 et 13 du Traité de la Communauté, d'avoir des actes juridiques pour lutter contre la discrimination. <BRK>

Paciotti (PE). - Signor Presidente, forse abbiamo fatto un errore a intitolare l'articolo 2 ai valori dell'Unione. Come ci ha detto il Praesidium, in realtà si tratta di principi fondamentali la cui violazione può comportare le sanzioni previste dall'articolo 45. E' dunque del tutto fuori luogo inserire in questa sede la menzione di tradizioni religiose, di radici greco-romane, di Dio come fonte di verità, bontà o bellezza, perché i valori e i principi che vengono indicati in una Costituzione devono poi ispirare obbligatoriamente l'azione delle istituzioni pubbliche; e dunque, se vi fossero richiami alle tradizioni religiose, le istituzioni non sarebbero più laiche. Né si può dire che in queste tradizioni c'è la storia dell'Europa: se si dovesse fissare l'identità europea sul passato, l'Europa assomiglierebbe a un fiume di sangue. Piuttosto, fra i principi fondamentali dell'articolo 2 dovrebbero essere ripresi i classici principi di liberté, égalité, fraternité, cioè vanno aggiunti alla libertà anche l'uguaglianza e la solidarietà, perché l'Unione europea non ammetterebbe fra i suoi membri uno Stato che violasse il principio di uguaglianza o che lasciasse morire di fame i suoi membri più deboli, i suoi cittadini più deboli.

Concordo con quanto hanno detto, per esempio, Ben Fayot e Jürgen Meyer, e quindi aggiungo poche cose. I diritti fondamentali dei cittadini, secondo me, devono figurare come prima parte della Costituzione e non essere ripetuti in altri singoli articoli; le basi giuridiche per le singole politiche possono trovare posto nella seconda parte della Costituzione. Io credo che sia incomprensibile, come ha detto il Presidente Giscard, che si possa proporre di cancellare il primo comma dell'articolo 3; credo, anzi, che nell'articolo 3, al punto 4, dobbiamo rispecchiare la volontà comune dei nostri popoli i quali ci chiedono, e con molta evidenza in questi giorni, che l'azione esterna dell'Unione si ispiri piuttosto al rifiuto della guerra come mezzo di risoluzione delle controversie internazionali. <BRK>

Musccardini (PE). - Presidente, anche recenti avvenimenti internazionali dimostrano la necessità di un Trattato che rispecchi al massimo le istanze delle diverse realtà nazionali. Dobbiamo procedere tenendo conto delle realtà che ci circondano, delle culture che rappresentiamo e degli obiettivi che possiamo raggiungere. La politica è l'arte di saper coniugare le aspirazioni a lungo termine con le contingenze e le condizioni obiettive. Il dibattito in corso ha dimostrato la volontà di molti di riconoscere gli Stati e le identità nazionali, e per questo la proposta di un'Europa federale contrasta con la realtà, che è più vicina ad un'unione di Stati europei capaci di lavorare insieme per obiettivi comuni: unione di Stati nei quali il rispetto dei diritti umani significhi la difesa della dignità della vita e il diritto ad una vita dignitosa, e perciò la tutela dell'infanzia, degli anziani e delle categorie più deboli.

L'Europa che prenderà vita col Trattato deve avere il coraggio della propria indipendenza e l'orgoglio della propria appartenenza. Per questo riteniamo che far riferimento alla tradizione greco-romana, giudaico-cristiana e laico-liberale non sia fuorviante o un riconoscimento formale, bensì un'affermazione di ciò che è la realtà. Nel bene e nel male, noi non saremmo qui, oggi, se Sparta ed Atene non avessero avuto la capacità di sedare i loro conflitti alle Termopili, se i greci e i romani non avessero tracciato la storia della filosofia e del diritto, se non ci fossero state Poitiers o la Magna Charta, che ha aperto il cammino per la definizione dei diritti dell'uomo. Oggi l'Europa non è vecchia, come qualcuno ci definisce, ma è radice delle grandi espressioni culturali che dai nostri popoli si sono profuse nel mondo. Sono sorte cattedrali e ardite concezioni architettoniche; ci sono stati roghi, libri bruciati, guerre fratricide, sangue e disperazione, ma anche continua crescita, ricerca di comprensione e di un nuovo modello di Stato sociale, nel rispetto di una tradizione cristiana che invita alla pace e al rispetto degli uomini e degli Stati, perché sia dato a Cesare quel che è di Cesare e a Dio quel che è di Dio. E quest'Europa, che noi lo scriviamo o meno, esiste e chiede di essere ascoltata e riconosciuta. <BRK>

Skaarup (Parl.-DK). - Hr. formand, jeg er et af de mange medlemmer, der har indsendt ændringsforslag til forfatningsudkastet fra formanden. Jeg synes imidlertid, at det er stærkt utilfredsstillende, at der går så lang tid, før sådanne ændringsforslag - det gælder ikke kun mine, men også mere generelt - kommer på Internettet. Det er også irriterende, at fristerne for at lave den slags ændringsforslag er så korte. Det har betydet, at det har været svært at koordinere udarbejdelsen af ændringsforslagene, som således ofte kun har én underskriver. Det havde nok været en fordel, hvis man havde bredt tingene lidt mere ud, således at vi kunne være gået sammen om nogle forslag. Så jeg synes bestemt, at Præsidiets skal genoverveje fastsættelsen af så korte frister fremover. Det duer ikke.

Nogle af de ændringsforslag, som jeg selv har været medvirkende til, er forslag vedrørende natur og miljø, men også vedrørende kristendom. Jeg mener grundlæggende, at det er vigtigt, at vi i forfatningen - hvis der skal være en forfatning - har noget med om kristendommen. Det er noget flere medlemmer af Konventet har talt for også i dag, og det hænger sammen med medlemsstater. Jeg mener ikke, at vi skal optage f.eks. Tyrkiet i EU. Tyrkiet er ikke en del af Europa, men et islamisk land, som har helt andre forudsætninger for det europæiske, end vi har her blandt de nuværende medlemsstater. Jeg vil også gerne vende mig kraftigt imod, at der indføres en ikke-diskriminationsklausul i forfatningen. Jeg mener, at det er fuldstændig uacceptabelt, at nogle grupper skal behandles anderledes end andre. I det danske folketing har vi netop behandlet direktivet vedrørende omvendt bevisbyrde i sager om diskrimination på baggrund af bl.a. etnisk oprindelse. Og det er efter min mening fuldstændig absurd, at man skal nyde en særlig beskyttelse, fordi man er af anden etnisk oprindelse. Skal vi også til at lave særlig beskyttelse for buttede mennesker, eller mennesker med blå øjne? Det duer ikke. Efter vores opfattelse skal det ikke med i en forfatning.

Til slut vil jeg sige, at hele forfatningsudkastet grundlæggende bygger på føderalisme, og det anser jeg for at være et meget, meget stort problem. Jeg opfatter den sunde skepsis, der er i mange befolkninger i Europa, som netop en modstand mod føderalisme men en tilgang og en positiv holdning til nationalstaterne. Altså at vi selv kan bestemme i vort eget hus. <BRK>

Kutskova (Gouv.-BG). - Let me start by making a general remark on the idea behind the amendments to draft Articles 1 to 16 of the constitutional treaty, submitted by the Bulgarian Government. The amendments are based on the following.

Firstly, we should keep in mind the text of the existing Treaties as well as the text agreed by consensus within the Convention. Secondly, we should make the formulations more concise, clear and understandable. We are of the opinion that it is essential to preserve the formula of ever closer union, here or in the preamble. This formula has, for the last fifty years, proven its vitality and inspired many Europeans in their efforts to create a more coherent and efficient Union. There is no reason to change the core objective of ever closer union as defined by the founding fathers. Our view is that this formula reflects the present reality as well as the vision for the future development of the Union.

As for Article 1(2), concerning respect for national identities, we should make the text more precise and clear by including the provision of Article 9(6) and, in addition, evoke the coexistence of different regimes as well as their fundamentals, religious or civic.

Concerning Article 2, we consider it preferable to keep the notion of principles typical of the acquis. In addition we suggest the inclusion of a reference to fundamental freedoms as presently found in Article 6(1) of the Treaty of the EU.

Our amendments to Article 3 are based on the list of objectives provided in both the present Treaties and the conclusions of the Convention's Working Groups on Social Europe and on Defence. The objective of promoting a high degree of social protection should be underlined by introducing the fight against poverty, social exclusion and any form of discrimination. Solidarity, as well as Member States' mutual assistance in the face of common threats to security, deserve a special place among the objectives of the European Union.

Concerning the Charter of Human Rights, I should like to reconfirm our position that the Charter should be set out in a protocol annexed to the constitution. <BRK>

Lekberg (Parl.-SE). - Herr ordförande! Först och främst vill jag säga att jag stöder grunderna i presidiets förslag när det gäller de första artiklarna. Låt mig sedan gå in och kommentera några av de ändringsförslag som jag önskar. Flera av dessa ändringsförslag har också stöd från samtliga svenska konventsledamöter och representerar således en samlad svensk uppfattning i dessa frågor.

Vi är eniga om att det klart bör framgå av konstitutionen att det är ett konstitutionellt fördrag och att medlemsländerna på frivillig basis överläter kompetens till unionen. Medborgarna skall veta att unionen i sig inte har kompetens att påföra sig ytterligare kompetens, utan att detta alltid måste godkännas av de nationella parlamenten.

Vidare vore det allvarligt om öppenhetsfrågorna fick en mindre framträdande plats i den nya konstitutionen i förhållande till nuvarande fördrag. Därför bör nuvarande unionsfördrags inledande skrivningar om öppenhet också finnas med i artikel 1 i det nya konstitutionella fördraget.

Jag satt med i den sociala arbetsgruppen. Där hade vi en mycket konstruktiv diskussion om unionens värden och mål och kunde enas kring ett antal bra förslag. Tyvärr har inte presidiet utgått från arbetsgruppens resultat när man har formulerat sina förslag, vilket jag beklagar.

Låt mig kortfattat peka på några viktiga förbättringar som skulle kunna göras: Jämställdhet mellan män och kvinnor, som är ett grundläggande värde i våra samhällen, borde också vara det för unionen och finnas med i artikel 2. I artikel 3 skulle jag vilja skriva in att också god arbetsmiljö, en förbättrad folkhälsa, skydd för barnens rättigheter samt lika möjligheter för alla oberoende av etnisk härkomst, religion, handikapp, ålder eller sexuell läggning, skall vara mål för unionen. Dessutom borde miljöfrågorna, såsom många har påpekat här, ges en betydligt starkare ställning i artikel 3. Här får vi inte ta steg tillbaka. <BRK>

Szájer (Parl.-HU). – I should like to speak on the spiritual reference. I have submitted amendments, together with 16 other EPP-DE Members and others, to include some reference to spiritual heritage.

Pope John Paul II indicated in a message to our President, Giscard d'Estaing, how important it is to include a reference to the spiritual roots of our common Europe. We Europeans know very well that the Judaeo-Christian culture is at the very foundation of our idea of a common Europe. Without this, presently we would not be able to speak about European integration and an ever closer union of the peoples of our continent.

The text we propose has been borrowed from the preamble to the Polish constitution: "The Union's values include the values of those who believe in God as a source of truth, justice, good and beauty, as well as those who do not share such a belief but respect these universal values arising from other sources."

It is conscious that it does not speak about any specific religion. This is not a protest about Catholic, Muslim or Jewish faiths. It speaks about God – which could be the God of various beliefs. In opposition to those who criticise it in this Convention, it is a tolerant, non-discriminative and inclusive concept, giving equal respect to those who do not believe in God and those of different beliefs. At the same time this formulation invokes an evident spiritual source for the present common Europe. For many of the candidate countries this is a very important message.

God may not be responsible for inventing or creating liberal democracy but, for many people under communist rule, religion has been one of the few remaining links to the common European heritage behind the Iron Curtain. These people now expect Europe to openly stand up for its principles. <BRK>

Rupel (Gouv.-SI). – I should like to draw your attention to some emphasis in the amendments I tabled on the first draft articles of the treaty.

I proposed an amendment to Article 3(3), which defines the Union's objectives. The purpose was to extend respect for cultural diversity in the Union to respect for linguistic diversity. The Slovene language is of the utmost importance for the Slovenes. It is a means of expression and the key to the very existence of the Slovene nation. A language can be interpreted as a field and means of expression, in which case the language is linked with human rights, democracy and freedom. Language is a symbol and value in itself. Many European nations have founded their right to independence, autonomy and sovereignty on the right to their freedom to use their mother or national tongue. One of the definitions of freedom involves freedom of expression. People are free when they can express themselves freely and thus realise themselves. Many states are based on nations, while the state of Slovenia is based on its special culture and unique language.

The Slovene language is the official and working language of Slovenia. Once we become a full member of the EU the Slovene language will become an official language of the Union; but we are aware that in all probability it will not become a working language of the Union. It is precisely because of this extraordinary importance of our language and the identification of the Slovenes with their language that I propose that linguistic diversity be included in the objectives. I am glad that many other fellow Convention members share the same view.

The existence of diversity in Europe will be further promoted if the treaty contains clear definitions, among the objectives, of non-discrimination on the basis of racial or ethnic origin, religion, sexual and other orientation. <BRK>

Voggenhuber (PE). - Herr Präsident! Erlauben Sie mir eine Vorbemerkung. Sie haben heute zwei Rednern als Sprecher ihrer Fraktionen eine verlängerte Redezeit zugestanden. Ich darf Sie darauf hinweisen, dass es im Konvent keine Fraktionen gibt und daher auch keine Sprecher! Wenn Sie diese Übung allerdings einführen, bitte ich Sie, alle Fraktionen und nicht nur zwei zu berücksichtigen, um so mehr, als die Zusammensetzung dieses Konvents die großen Fraktionen ohnehin außerordentlich bevorzugt, allein schon durch die Tatsache, dass zwei Delegierte pro nationales Parlament im Wesentlichen nur die großen Fraktionen vertreten können. Ich bitte um Fairness und auch um Einhaltung der Geschäftsordnung!

Nun zu Ihrem Vorschlag. Seit 1957 gibt es ein zentrales Ziel der europäischen Integration, ich betone, seit 1957, nämlich den immer engeren Zusammenschluss, der nach Maastricht zur immer engeren Union wurde. Es ist das Gründungsziel dieser Europäischen Union. Niemand im Konvent hat verlangt, es fallen zu lassen. Es fehlt in Ihrem Vorschlag. Eine einzige Legitimation könnte ich mir dafür vorstellen, dass wir die Finalität der europäischen Integration verwirklichen, dass wir die engstmögliche politische Einheit Europas herstellen. Tut das diese Verfassung? Nein, das tut sie mit Sicherheit nicht. Wir bleiben im Prozess der Annäherung an die politische Einheit Europas. Daher ist es meines Erachtens nach eine völlig unzulässige Aufgabe des Gründungsgedankens der Union, den immer engeren Zusammenschluss Europas fallen zu lassen. Die Regierungszusammenarbeit, die hier von vielen beschworen wird - ich darf Sie an die Geschichte erinnern -, ist eine Erfindung von Maastricht, 35 Jahre nach der föderalen Ordnung als Ziel der europäischen Integration. Europa war als Gemeinschaft gedacht, als föderale Ordnung von Anfang an, und erst 35 Jahre später als Regierungszusammenarbeit in einigen Bereichen, und ich darf Sie daran erinnern, dass es nur als Zwischenstufe der Integration gedacht war, niemals aber als zentrales Architekturelement Europas. Es ist Zeit, sich daran zu erinnern.

Ich wünsche mir, wenn Sie mir noch ein paar Stichworte erlauben, eine hohe Sprache der Verfassung und nicht eine technokratische Sprache der Rechtstexte. Ich wünsche mir, dass die Bürgerinnen und Bürger deshalb als Gründer dieser Union anerkannt werden, weil sie - Kinder gründen ja keine Union - der höchste Souverän sowohl des Nationalstaates als auch der Europäischen Union sind. Ich wünsche mir, dass in den Werten kein Rückfall hinter die Verträge stattfindet. Serracino-Ingloft (Gouv.-MT). – The aim of this intervention is to stress the importance – which is more than is immediately apparent – of the explicit mention of spatial considerations, in the second part of Article 3 dealing with the Union's objectives. In the most general sense it is important that at this historic moment, when we are witnessing the birth of global virtual space, we declare that we, in Europe, are constituting a space that while intensely transactional is also a common heritage.

The affirmation that territorial, as well as economic and social, cohesion is a primary objective of the Union is necessary, not only because geographical disadvantage, unlike social and economic inequalities, is not remedied by merely transitory measures. It requires structural provisions. This would also help to highlight the perspective of European territory as a common heritage.

For a similar reason we are in favour of the proposed explicit allusion to the exploration – not discovery – of outer space among European objectives. I suggest that outer space should be coupled with ocean space. Surely the constitution needs to show a greater awareness of European maritime space. Our coastal zones and islands are not a mere economic periphery; they are our crucial interface with the rest of the world. <BRK>

Figel, Jan (Parl.-SK). – I should like to express my consensus with the President who mentioned, at the beginning of his remarks, the situation concerning the Iraqi and European lack of unity.

The quality of results is more important than time limits, so we should not exclude the possibility that we will need more time in order to achieve good results for the future IGC.

I should like to briefly mention three articles. I believe that a constitutional treaty is a more appropriate name than a constitution. The Union is a unique body, but not so in a classical understanding. "The European Union" is a better name than any alternative ones. There were disputes as to whether to use the federal basis or a confederal reference, as one speaker said. "The Union shall administer certain competences on a communitarian basis" could be a solution for this understanding.

Concerning the values in Article 2, I support the inclusion of a new clause, Article 2(2), with invoking of God. It was explained by Mr Szájer. We believe that a tolerant, acceptable and inclusive reference is possible and positive for the understanding in future, not only in present Member States but also in future Member States. A uniting reference for different cultures could be helpful, especially for Christian, Jewish and Islamic cultures in Europe. A transcendent authority in regard to political structures can help us understand the limits of power, giving human dignity its highest meaning. Yesterday, an absolute majority of the Slovak Parliament voted in favour of a reference to God in the European constitutional treaty.

Concerning Article 3, because of the current experience of Europe, which does not play a decisive role in seeking a solution to the Iraq crisis, we should be more explicit about the role of Europe in the world and more outward- than inward-looking in domestic or European matters. Therefore Article 3(4) could be broadened in this way. "The Union shall seek to advance its values in the wider world through a common external relations policy, in particular a common foreign and security policy based on solidarity and mutual loyalty." <BRK>

Roche (Ch.E./G.-IE). – I have already made reference to the use of the word "federal". I will not repeat the same points. However, Mr Brok touched on a very sensible proposition. There is no point in getting ourselves hung up on words if, in fact, we know that the treaty itself would prescribe the nature of the Union.

To take up a point made by the last speaker, the title "the European Union" is familiar to our citizens. I see no basis whatsoever for changing that.

With regard to Articles 2 and 3, language that is clear, crisp and legible is an absolute requirement. We need to do further work on the text. I appreciate the pressure that the Secretariat is under. I draw specific reference, however, to Article 3(4)(1). The concept of "defending the Union's independence" is inappropriate in the context in which we are discussing the Union. It is an inappropriate set of words, which could be struck down.

With regard to legal personality, I very firmly believe that the Union should have a legal personality but we should be clear that in imparting a legal personality we do not eradicate the need for a distinctive approach in policy areas.

With regard to Article 5, which has excited a degree of specific reference here today, on the question of the Charter, it is very important that we incorporate the amendments proposed by the working group. Other Members have said that it makes good sense to incorporate the Charter by way of protocol. It does not give any less legal status but it would make the whole treaty a more legible document.

I have already submitted a series of comments on Articles 8 and 9. There is a reference to the primacy of Union law. It overstates the position and needs clarification.

I make a similar point with regard to economic policy. I proposed an amendment which would make it clear that the primary role rests with the Member States in coordinating their economic policies.

In the area of CFSP there is a need to stick more closely to Article 17 of the TEU. <BRK>

Severin (Parl.-RO). – On Article 1(1), the Union's legitimacy should be based on the will of the citizens, peoples and states. Citizenship is a legal concept. Peoples is a vague concept and recognised in law mainly when it is about the right to self-determination.

Point 2, the Union should administer common competences and also coordinate national policies. The two formulations must be kept as such.

Point 3, when it is a question of common competences the Union acts on a federal basis. This is very clear. Either we have to say it is a federation of nation states or we have to say something else. However, a mere deletion of these words would be misleading and give the wrong signals.

Point 4, the dynamic character of the Union should be also reflected in Article 1.

On Article 2, the Union respects national identities – this is excellent, but we need to add something about European cultural diversity. The non-discrimination clause should also be put in this part of the constitution.

On Article 3, I would like to see included there the fight against exclusion, environmental protection, the social market economy and territorial cohesion, along with social and economic cohesion. A horizontal clause to link all our values, objectives and policies should also be included. There are various amendments to that effect. We should adopt one of them.

On Article 5, the Charter should be clearly included in the constitution. We should not use the formula of a separate protocol. <BRK>

Baroness Scotland of Asthal (Ch.E/G.-GB). – I too would urge the Praesidium to reconsider the drafting of Article 5 so that it reflects the spirit and substance of the compromise and the recommendations for further work reached by Working Group II.

The United Kingdom's position has always been – and we are clearly not alone in this – that the Charter we welcome as a political declaration was not drafted in a form suitable for incorporation in the treaties. That remains the case. However, we have not been afraid of looking at ideas on how to give the Charter legal status. The challenge is to find ways to give our citizens legal security and certainty in relation to the Charter's ambiguous and conflicting text.

The working group came forward with some amendments to the so-called horizontal articles in the Charter, plus the prospect of satisfactory, official, legal explanations to accompany it. This was endorsed in plenary. I proposed that we give Commissioner Vitorino the time he needs to complete his valuable work on these explanations. It would seem sensible to pause briefly, to wait for this work to be finished, before we hold further substantive discussions on Article 5.

I hope and believe that a completed package from Working Group II may help us to find an answer to the Charter status on which we can all soon agree. <BRK>

Tiilikainen (Ch.E/G.-FI). – I very much appreciate the draft treaty in the sense that it both integrates the Charter of Fundamental Rights and creates an obligation for the European Union to accede to the European Convention on Human Rights. Both instruments are needed in order to enhance citizens' rights.

Citizens' rights and freedoms form the starting point for a constitution. This Charter will consequently have a corresponding position in this constitutional treaty. It must be included in the second title of the first part of this treaty, otherwise we undermine the role it should have.

As far as accession to the European Convention on Human Rights is concerned, the treaty should include a stronger obligation to reach that goal than it currently does. <BRK>

Van Lancker (PE). – Merci Monsieur le Président. Je voudrais faire une remarque sur l'intervention du Commissaire Barnier concernant la relation entre l'article 5 et l'article 6 - article 5 sur l'insertion de la Charte et article 6 sur la non-discrimination, éventuellement étendue à d'autres formes de discrimination -. Je suis complètement d'accord avec ce qu'a dit le Commissaire Barnier sur le fait que la Charte en elle-même ne constitue pas une base juridique d'action pour l'Union et que, pour cela, il faut établir clairement la compétence. Vous allez voir, dans le débat de demain, que plusieurs conventionnels ont introduit un amendement dans l'article 12 pour inscrire la compétence de l'Union, pour prendre des mesures.

Il a raison aussi sur le fait que nous avons besoin d'une base légale, l'actuel article 13 éventuellement élargi. Mais là, nous avons cru que les bases légales pour les mesures concrètes seraient plutôt établies dans la partie 3 de la Constitution, où on décrit les politiques et établit les bases légales concrètes. Je comprends que, ne connaissant pas encore le contenu de la partie 3, il est peut-être utile de prendre des précautions. Mais je crois que le message essentiel à adresser au praesidium est qu'il faut conserver la capacité d'agir de l'Union européenne en matière de discrimination et qu'il faut trouver une bonne solution que ce soit dans la partie 1 ou dans la partie 3. <BRK>

Nagy (Parl.-BE). – Merci Monsieur le Président. Je m'associe tout à fait à l'intervention de ma collègue Van Lancker. Je pense aussi que la question de l'incorporation de la Charte a un lien avec la visibilité qu'on pourra lui donner vis-à-vis des citoyens et que c'est là que réside un petit peu la difficulté par rapport aux différentes propositions.

Je pense que l'idée d'une clause horizontale est essentielle pour assurer la cohérence des différentes politiques.

Je voulais réagir vis-à-vis des collègues qui insistent sur le fait de faire référence à Dieu dans la Constitution. Je pense que c'est vraiment une erreur et qu'il ne faut pas le faire. En effet, l'histoire de l'Europe, c'est aussi l'histoire de la philosophie grecque, ce sont aussi des choses qui n'ont justement rien à voir avec cette référence à Dieu et c'est surtout une conception de l'Etat qui fait que celui-ci est neutre par rapport aux conceptions philosophiques et religieuses. Par conséquent, rouvrir ce débat équivaut, vis-à-vis de la Convention, à commettre une très très grande erreur. <BRK>

Kiljunen (Parl.-FI). – I have already expressed my doubts about using the term "federal" or "confederal". It leads us to the wrong associations about our aspirations.

Mr Severin said that there will be a vacuum if we leave out altogether the words "federal basis". He said that something should be put in. Perhaps then we could add the words "and which shall administer certain common competences on a supranational basis", or alternatively, "administer certain common competences on a Community basis" at the end of Article 1(1). That would fill the vacuum that Mr Severin was afraid would exist.

On values, I stress equality. It is one of the key values of the Union and most definitely should be in Article 2. By equality I mean gender equality. I also mean social equality. That is why it is so important to add that word.

We should also add minority rights to the values. This concerns a significant part of the Union's population and so should be specifically mentioned in our new constitutional treaty, alongside human rights. Minority rights are a key issue for European states today.

To my mind, the key concept is solidarity. I am very satisfied that it has been included in the Praesidium's draft as a key value. <BRK>

Bonde (PE). – The first 16 articles mention the word "constitution" 32 times. Thank you for this clarity. The Democracy Forum proposes to change that word to "treaty established according to international law".

Article 1 refers to respect for the national identities of Member States. We should add, more importantly, their national constitutions, their legislative assemblies and national sovereignty. Drop Article 2 or add, in particular, transparent democracy. Do we need values in an international treaty? Insert "not" in Article 4; the EU shall not only negotiate treaties; the EU shall only negotiate treaties after a mandate from the Member States.

Article 5 moves the primacy of fundamental rights from the Member States' high courts and the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg, to the EU court in Luxembourg. Instead, let the EU institutions be bound by the European Convention on Human Rights and the basic rights in the national constitutions.

Article 6 prohibits national discrimination. We should drop this general clause and be more precise. This article could dissolve the nations if it is not limited to a part of economic activity in the common market. Will the article, for instance, overrule the Danish protocol on second homes?

Article 7 looks like more EU citizens' rights. If there is a conflict between national and EU citizenship, the EU rules will prevail, as in Germany with the citizenship of Bavaria. Free movement has to respect the legislation of the Member States.

Articles 8 and 9 insist on primacy. For all EU law we propose the primacy of national constitutions and the Convention on Human Rights.

The first 16 articles claim to organise Europe on a federal basis, but there is no clear division of powers between the federal level and the nations. It looks more like a unitary state than the American federation. The federal authorities decide what is left to the nations. We propose to turn the power pyramid and leave it to the voters and the national parliaments to decide what must be decided at EU level. Let the national parliaments elect the Commissioners, decide the annual law catalogue and administer the principle of solidarity. Give the national parliaments the right of veto on very vital issues, so that parliamentary democracy will always prevail. Democracy was born in 508 BC. We are not here to bury it. <BRK>

Γιαννάκου-Κουτσίκου (Parl.-GR). – Κύριε Πρόεδρε, οφείλω να σημειώσω ευθύς αμέσως ότι τα πρώτα δεκαέξι άρθρα του Συντάγματος κινούνται στη σωστή κατεύθυνση. Επιτρέψτε μου, βέβαια, να κάνω ορισμένες παρατηρήσεις σε σχέση με τροπολογίες που έχουν κατατεθεί.

Η Συνταγματική Συνθήκη χρειάζεται ασφαλώς σαφείς και συγκεκριμένες αναφορές σε ζητήματα αρχών, αξιών, πνευματικής παράδοσης, πολιτιστικής κληρονομιάς, αιεφόρου ανάπτυξης και πλήρους απασχόλησης. Γιατί εδώ δεν έχουμε να κάνουμε με σύνταγμα κράτους μέλους. Οι αναφορές αυτές περιλαμβάνονται στο προοίμιο που έχει καταθέσει το Ευρωπαϊκό Λαϊκό Κόμμα, αλλά και στο άρθρο 2 της προτεινόμενης Συνθήκης.

Στο άρθρο 3 πρέπει να γίνει οπωσδήποτε αναφορά στην παρουσία της Ένωσης στη διεθνή σκηνή, αλλά και σε μια εξωτερική πολιτική και πολιτική ασφάλειας που διακρίνεται από αλληλεγγύη και αμοιβαία πίστη. Εδώ νομίζω ότι πρέπει να σημειωθεί ότι η ισχύς της Ένωσης προέρχεται και από την κοινωνική συνοχή. Αυτό σημαίνει ότι η καταπολέμηση της μεγάλης φτώχειας και η κοινωνική ενσωμάτωση είναι αρχές που πρέπει να υποστηριχθούν στο ίδιο άρθρο.

Στο άρθρο 4, κύριε Πρόεδρε, πρέπει να υπάρξουν ειδικές αναφορές για τις σχέσεις της Ένωσης και των κρατών μελών στη βάση των ιδίων αρχών. Και εδώ προτείνουμε να προστεθεί μια ρήτρα αλληλεγγύης σε δύο θέματα. Πρώτον, σε τρομοκρατική επίθεση εναντίον κράτους μέλους και, δεύτερον, σε περίπτωση ένοπλης κλασικής επίθεσης εναντίον κράτους μέλους, απ' οπουδήποτε και αν προέρχεται αυτή, η Ένωση πρέπει να εκφράζει αμέσως την αλληλεγγύη της, όπως και στην πρώτη περίπτωση, διαθέτοντας στρατιωτικές δυνάμεις και λαμβάνοντας αστυνομικά και δικαστικά μέτρα, αλλά και διαθέτοντας κάθε αναγκαίο μέσο για την προστασία των πολιτών.

Κύριε Πρόεδρε, με την ευκαιρία της αναφοράς αυτής, είμαι υποχρεωμένη να σημειώσω ότι είναι μοναδική ευκαιρία να επανέλθουμε όσοι πιστεύουμε σε μια ενιαία εξωτερική δράση της Ένωσης. Το κενό που υπάρχει στην εξωτερική πολιτική και την πολιτική άμυνας φάνηκε το τελευταίο διάστημα. Πρέπει να κάνουμε το μεγάλο βήμα προς μια ενιαία εξωτερική έκφραση, αλλά και πιο ειλικρινείς διατλαντικές σχέσεις. Αν συνεχιστεί η προσπάθεια ορισμένων, αντί να διαλέγονται και να συγκλίνουν μεταξύ τους, με την παραμικρή ευκαιρία να παραμερίζουν το καλώς νοούμενο ευρωπαϊκό συμφέρον, θα υπάρξει κρίση ταυτότητας στην Ένωση.

Στόχος αυτής της Συνταγματικής Συνθήκης πρέπει να είναι μια Ένωση επιθυμητή για τους λαούς και τους πολίτες και έτσι η Χάρτα Θεμελιωδών Δικαιωμάτων πρέπει να ενσωματωθεί στη Συνθήκη. <BRK>

Kacin (Parl.-SI). – By definition, Europe is an association of individuals. This is in the preamble of the charter. It says that "the Union places the individual at the heart of its activities". I therefore propose that a future description of the European Union be "a union of citizens, peoples and states". I believe that the European Union as a union of prosperity, economic opportunities and the rule of law is primarily designed for the individual.

It was already explained what "people" means in various languages. There are many languages in Europe. Every language has its own definition, so I believe that definitions are crucial to our mutual understanding. I come from a country that has both positive and a lot of negative experiences with living in a multicultural state. In my opinion, the formulation "on a federal basis" could also generate an unfavourable attitude towards membership among citizens of those candidate countries that have had, or still have, practical experience with the federal model of state integration.

To speak about different federal concepts is difficult since there is no single definition of the term. On the contrary, federal ideas are numerous and each of them is different, at least in nuance and specific historic practice. Federations are complex formations and the rules of the game are very complicated. Anyone can create their own model of a federal state, which does not necessarily reflect reality. Because of that, the use of this term is best avoided and the wording chosen should be that "the competences shall be exercised in accordance with this constitution".

Regarding Article 3, we should emphasise that the Union is primarily designed for the individual. Integration in the European Union also means the integration of regions. That is why I propose that the constitutional treaty should also promote solidarity between regions. <BRK>

Tajani (PE). - Signor Presidente, ho apprezzato il lavoro del Praesidium e ho altresì ascoltato con grande attenzione, direi con non poca soddisfazione, anche le parole del Presidente Giscard a proposito dello stato giuridico delle chiese, delle radici religiose dell'Europa. Io credo che la Costituzione che fonderà la nuova Unione dovrà prevedere un riferimento alla dimensione religiosa; se non riconosciamo questo prezioso retaggio, dimenticheremo la tragica lezione dei totalitarismi del Novecento che, negando Dio e la religione, negavano la dignità dell'uomo e gettavano le basi per il suo annientamento, e dimenticheremo che furono proprio i valori dell'umanesimo cristiano ad ispirare i grandi statisti che nel dopoguerra fecero l'Europa politica. In questo quadro, in molti abbiamo proposto che sia fatto riferimento all'eredità religiosa nel preambolo del nuovo Trattato e che si affermi, nell'articolo 2, che i valori dell'Unione includono i valori di coloro che credono in Dio quale fonte di verità, giustizia, bene e bellezza, come pure di coloro che, pur non condividendo questa fede, osservano questi universali valori sulla base di altre ispirazioni. Queste proposte non hanno nulla di confessionale né vogliono mettere in discussione la separazione tra Stato e chiesa, cosa che peraltro non accade nei paesi dove pure c'è un qualche riferimento costituzionale alla dimensione religiosa, come in Germania, Irlanda, Svizzera, Polonia e Stati Uniti.

In questo quadro io credo che si debba anche dare, fra gli attori sociali, un ruolo di primaria ed originale importanza alle chiese delle altre comunità religiose, che sono soggetti che giocano una parte fondamentale nella coesione delle società europee. Le chiese svolgono infatti, per non dir altro, un insostituibile lavoro di aggregazione, formazione ed assistenza, ad ogni livello e in ogni ambiente, spesso supplendo alla lacunosa presenza delle istituzioni. In riferimento allo status giuridico delle chiese, noi abbiamo presentato un emendamento, ma ho ascoltato con grande attenzione quanto ha detto il Presidente Giscard riguardo alla dichiarazione 11, allegata al Trattato di Amsterdam.

Concludo, signor Presidente, con un riferimento: ho presentato un emendamento all'articolo 6 perché vengano tutelati dal Trattato costituzionale i più deboli, e soprattutto i trentasette milioni di cittadini europei che sono disabili. Credo che un riferimento esplicito, nel Trattato costituzionale, debba essere inserito. <BRK>

Wittbrodt (Parl.-PL). – The first draft articles of the treaty are crucial for the European construction as they describe the basis and fundamental values of our continent.

First of all, the Union should manage rather than administer common competences. Besides, at this early stage of the constitution-building process it is difficult to assume that competences are governed on a federal basis.

Secondly, the European Union was always based on the principle of solidarity. This was understood as elimination of disparities among the countries in terms of economic and social cohesion. In the draft articles the solidarity principle does not touch on cohesion but rather, solidarity is understood as loyalty in international relations. This makes solidarity a tool, not a principle, in order to achieve a peaceful Europe. Therefore I suggest we introduce a new article on solidarity, which is needed in order to carry out the Union's mission. It seems essential, especially for the new Member States.

Thirdly, in Article 2, which introduces the Union's values, we should point to our European roots and traditions. As our fundamental values were shaken up by other beliefs, we have to write this in the constitution. In order to find agreement on this issue, I support the proposals of the PPE-DE group. In particular, I suggest a new article, which links up with the Polish constitution, but perhaps this might be moved to the preamble.

In Article 1 it is suggested that the Union should respect not only the national identities of its Member States but also their constitutional and political structures, including government, their choices regarding language, and the legal status of churches and religious societies. The last part of the sentence responds to COMECE postulates. <BRK>

Brejc (Parl.-SI). – The Praesidium produced a good basis for the first 16 articles of the constitutional treaty. Perhaps the members of the Convention rightly expect their greater inclusion in the creation of this treaty. This must, in my opinion, lay a foundation for a Europe of human rights, solidarity, loyalty and respect for different identities.

That is why I am in favour of including the Charter of Fundamental Rights at the beginning of the treaty, since this charter is of great symbolic importance to all Member States and not only to acceding countries. I also believe that the Union should be based on loyalty among the Member States in all areas, since such loyalty, which should be included in the treaty as a general principle, is a precondition for the efficient functioning of the Union. I therefore fully support Amendment 4(b) tabled by my colleagues from the PPE-DE group.

Loyalty and solidarity are connected. The Union should also be based on solidarity among the Member States. The events of 11 September showed how vulnerable we are and how important it is to hold together at such times. Therefore I support Amendment 4 (c) proposed by my colleagues.

I am in favour of including linguistic diversity in Article 3(3) because I believe that language is an important element of the identity of every nation, and a small nation in particular. In my opinion this is a good amendment since it supplements and more clearly defines Article 1(2), which says that "the Union shall respect the national identities of its Member States". In the Member States, in addition to these identities, there are also various national minorities which need to be protected. <BRK>

Haenel (Parl.-FR). – Merci Monsieur le Président. Quelle place pour la question religieuse dans la Constitution? Premièrement, l'Union ne doit pas intervenir dans le statut des Eglises et communautés religieuses dans les Etats membres. Il y a, dans nos Etats, des solutions différentes. L'Union doit les respecter, l'Union n'a pas à s'en mêler. Ces différences sont liées à l'histoire de chacun de nos pays. Par conséquent, le respect du statut national des Eglises et communautés religieuses doit figurer explicitement dans le domaine de ce qu'on appelle la clause Christophersen.

Deuxièmement, de même que la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme, la Charte garantit la liberté de conscience et de religion. Nous n'avons pas à revenir sur ce sujet. Je souhaite donc que la Charte et son préambule soient intégrés tels quels à la future Constitution de l'Union.

Troisièmement, à propos des références religieuses. Le vrai problème est celui de l'identité européenne. L'identité européenne, nous ne pouvons pas la trouver seulement dans ses valeurs communes qui ont une vocation universelle. En effet, les droits de l'homme, la solidarité sociale, le respect de l'environnement sont des valeurs pour l'ensemble du monde, par seulement pour l'Europe. L'identité européenne réside donc en grande partie dans les héritages que nous avons en commun et que nous devons assumer. Or, qu'on le veuille ou non, ces héritages ont une dimension religieuse. Cette dimension religieuse est en quelque sorte consubstantielle à l'héritage commun. On ne peut pas comprendre la culture européenne en ignorant ou en niant le christianisme, le judaïsme, l'islam, pas plus qu'on ne peut la comprendre en ignorant l'humanisme laïque. Donc, si nous voulons une Europe qui ait une identité, nous devons accepter et reconnaître l'influence des héritages culturels, humanistes et religieux de l'Europe sur son identité profonde sans que cela entraîne en quoi que ce soit une position privilégiée pour telle ou telle croyance. Cette reconnaissance devrait se faire dans le préambule de la future Constitution car on est là dans le domaine du symbole et non dans celui des règles de droit. Si nous ne voulons pas aborder sereinement et objectivement cette question, elle resurgira à l'occasion des ratifications référendaires ou parlementaires quand nous aurons à nous prononcer. <BRK>

Hololei (Gouv.-EE). – I will come back to Article 1 later. I wanted to intervene earlier but due to lack of time, that had to be postponed.

The original idea of Laeken was to make Europe more understandable to the citizens. It has been claimed that the wording of Article 1(1) also intends to improve clarity, stating in a matter of fact manner that the Union shall administer certain common competences on a federal basis. This is supposed to acknowledge the existing state of the art. I am not convinced that the wording will explain the functioning of the Union to some of the citizens of the Union, notably those living in a federal state. For them it might ring a bell, but there are other countries where this word will not help to explain the functioning of the Union but rather, complicate things and confirm the fears they have held for a while that Europe is developing into a superstate.

The first part of Article 1(1) reads well, but the second part that Mr Roche proposed could be deleted or perhaps changed as follows: "within which Member States can coordinate certain policies at European level to achieve common goals. In order to achieve that, Member States will delegate certain of their competences to the Union, which shall administer those competences in common."

Some speakers have mentioned that the younger generation would not forgive us if we deleted the word "federal". Please be careful about that. As one of the youngest members of the Convention, I have the right to say that the younger generation would not forgive us if we could not find more appropriate wording, acceptable to all generations across Europe.

I fully support Mr Hjelm-Wallén, who intervened on the use of the word "treaty" as a shorthand for the constitutional treaty throughout the text. We already have a treaty that is going to be signed by the Member States, if I remember correctly. This was a preferred option decided at the beginning of the work of the Convention. Our tabled comments have also underlined that controversy. <BRK>

Azevedo (Parl.-PT). - Senhor Presidente, quanto à análise dos primeiros artigos, gostaria de sublinhar que, em meu entender, eles devem ser particularmente claros e pedagógicos. O artigo 1º, que tem quase tudo o que é nuclear para enquadrar a essência da União, deve ainda consagrar a igualdade entre os Estados-Membros mostrando que este princípio continua a ser regra de ouro da construção europeia. Quanto à referência federal, identifique-se e debata-se primeiro o modelo federal europeu. Será mais transparente e sobretudo mais compreensível para os cidadãos, evitar-se-iam mal-entendidos e populismos. Quanto ao artigo 2º, será a sede ideal, na minha opinião, para consagrar a igualdade entre homens e mulheres, porque princípio fundamental. Quanto ao artigo 3º, entre os objectivos da União deve ainda contar-se a valência territorial da coesão. E, num mundo consciente da importância da segurança alimentar e ambiental para a saúde colectiva, devemos também contar com a promoção de elevados níveis da protecção de saúde humana.

Por fim, quanto à Carta, regozijo-me vivamente com a sua inclusão em parte nobre da Constituição. Salvaguardado o seu valor jurídico, ficarão assim garantidos o seu peso e força política, e a União afirmar-se-á inequivocamente como uma comunidade de valores.

Senhor Presidente, esta volumosa resma de papel ao lado de cada um de nós mostra estarmos todos inequivocamente empenhados em construir uma constituição que desafie o tempo. <BRK>

Arabadjiev (Parl.-BG). – It is my understanding that the direct articles should reflect the work of the working groups and the conclusions reached by them. In the case of Article 5, whose ambit corresponds to the work of Working Group II, I find that the suggestion of having the Charter set out in the second part of the constitution or in a protocol annexed to it does not follow and does not respect the order of the basic options recommended by the working group and the significance attributed to each of these options.

It is also my understanding that one of the objectives of having the Charter was to make human rights more visible. Now it is proposed to hide the Charter in a separate protocol.

In Article 5(2), which deals with the issue of accession to the European Convention on Human Rights, I have tabled the amendment that seems to be the most compelling alternative wording with the imperative "shall", instead of the enabling "may" accede. Being strongly in favour of accession, I have proposed the most radical version, which I hope is not the most inadequate. I realise that this strong formula may have problems in terms of its legal correctness. For this reason I am prepared to make a concession and accept a milder version, which will, however, still contain a clear commitment to accession and will create a legal obligation and not only a possibility of accession.

Finally, in strictly legal terms, accession would entail – to use the language of the relevant opinion of the European Court of Justice – due entry into a distinct international institutional system. Such a modification would be of constitutional significance.

I believe that if the Charter became binding upon the entry into force of the constitutional treaty, without any federal decision being taken by the Convention on accession, this would break the link between these two complementary steps and the Convention would miss the existing opportunity to achieve a coherent system for the protection of human rights ...

Kaufmann (PE). - Herr Präsident! Die Vorschläge, einen Gottesbezug in die europäische Verfassung aufzunehmen, sollte der Konvent klar zurückweisen. Wir können doch nicht, wie es die vorgeschlagene Formel tut, die Menschen in der Union in zwei Kategorien teilen, in Gläubige und Ungläubige! Artikel 10 der Grundrechtecharta garantiert Gedanken-, Gewissens- und Religionsfreiheit für alle Menschen in Europa, und das ist gut so. Ich bin aber strikt dagegen, Europa auf religiöse Glaubensformeln zu verpflichten. In dieser Frage, Herr Präsident, unterstütze ich Ihre Position ausdrücklich.

Europa hat in der jüngsten Vergangenheit ein Erbe, auf das es sich zu berufen lohnt. Sie alle kennen dieses Bild enthusiastischer Aktivisten der ersten Stunde, die über die Grenzen fuhren, um zu demonstrieren, wir wollen ein Europa ohne Nationalismus, Krieg und Faschismus. Persönlichkeiten wie Henri Frensy, Chef der französischen Widerstandsbewegung Combat, der deutsche Buchenwald-Überlebende Eugen Kogon oder der Italiener Altiero Spinelli, der Mussolinis Gefängnisse durchlitt, sie gründeten unmittelbar nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg zusammen die europäische Bewegung. Eben weil sie gemeinsam gelitten hatten, engagierten sie sich im Sinne einer gemeinsamen Verantwortung für die freiheitliche, demokratische und friedliche Entwicklung Europas. Das Europa des 21. Jahrhunderts sollte dieses antifaschistische Erbe seiner Gründer immer im Gedächtnis behalten, es in der Verfassung für die Zukunft bewahren.

Übrigens nicht nur nach Spinelli, sondern auch nach Bertha von Suttner ist hier ein Gebäude benannt. Damit wird zu Recht das Andenken an eine Frau bewahrt, deren Appell "die Waffen nieder" mit zum wichtigsten Erbe Europas gehört. Eingedenk dessen halte ich es für unverzichtbar, eine klare Friedensverpflichtung der Europäischen Union in der Verfassung zu verankern, und ich denke, all dies sind wir den Vorkämpferinnen und Vorkämpfern der europäischen Integration beim Verfassen der Verfassung verpflichtet. <BRK>

De Rossa (Parl.-IE). – A strong statement of social objectives needs to be incorporated in Article 3: full employment, rather than a high level of employment; social inclusion, which implies tackling poverty both inside and outside the Union; services of general interest, a fundamental part of Europe's unique social market economy. The Charter needs to be incorporated in the body of the constitution, not relegated to a protocol. Arguments about the legality and so on are unimportant. What is important is the perception of how importantly we regard the rights of citizens.

On the question of federalism we have to be ambitious. Dropping the word "federal" will not convince Mr Bonde or any of his followers that what we are about is creating a federation of nation states. We have to be ambitious. People are urging us to give them leadership. They have marched in their millions in the last few weeks demanding that leadership. We should give it to them.

On the question of God, I happen to be a retired Irish catholic. I know a bit about God and the good and the bad he or she can do. I suggest that the Charter already provides adequately for the concerns of believers. I fundamentally object to the proposal that the values of religious believers should be additional to the values already outlined in the constitution. Some sects of religious believers' values are repugnant to equality, freedom and bodily integrity. I will not accept them being incorporated into the European constitution. <BRK>

Attalidis (Gouv.-CY). – I would like to touch on four points relating to Articles 1 and 3.

First, I believe that, for reasons of historical continuity, the name of the Union should continue to be "the European Union". This is the name that citizens of Member States know and it is the entity which citizens of candidate countries are aware that their governments have applied to join.

Secondly, in Article 1(3) we should refer to the Union being open to European states whose peoples share the same objectives, as well as values. This corresponds to the actual practice of the Union. The Copenhagen criteria can be described more accurately as objectives, rather than values.

Thirdly, I agree with Mr de Villepin and others who have proposed that we maintain the reference to an ever closer union. It is a historic phrase expressing the aspiration of the founders and the nations of Europe to a step-by-step enhancement of the Union. It does not necessarily carry the connotation of a continuous transfer of competences from the Member States to the Union. In Article 3(4) there should be more specification of the objectives of the European Union's external action along the lines elaborated by Working Group VII so that along with the objectives outlined in the text, we should also refer to the aim of advancing in the wider world democracy, the rule of law, the universality and indivisibility of human rights and fundamental freedoms, the principles of human dignity, equality and solidarity, and respect for international law, in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations. <BRK>

Pieters (Parl.-BE). - Voorzitter, collega's, er wordt hier veel gesproken over en gestreden voor de grote principes en de grote doelstellingen. Wellicht moet dat ook zo wanneer we het over een constitutioneel verdrag hebben. Maar laten we dan toch ook leven naar die principes die niet betwist zijn en we allemaal voorstaan. Laat er geen al te grote kloof ontstaan tussen woord en daad, tussen beginsel en concreet recht van de Europese burger. Zo belijden we allemaal dat de rijkdom van de Unie onder meer bestaat uit haar culturele en dus ook taalkundige verscheidenheid. Zo belijden wij ook de fundamentele gelijkheid van alle lidstaten, van alle burgers en dus ook van alle talen van de Unie. Nu, hier knelt het schoentje.

Ik verwijs voor de huidige toestand naar mijn eerder verspreide studie over de talen van de Unie, die u allemaal ter hand is gesteld. In mijn amendement 7, bij artikel 7, lid 2, pleit ik er concreet voor het recht van de burger van de Unie te erkennen om in al zijn communicatie met de Unie een officiële taal van de Unie van zijn keuze te gebruiken en ook gelijktijdig de wetten, de besluiten en andere informatie waar hij belang bij heeft, in zijn eigen taal van keuze te kunnen verkrijgen.

Voor vele, zonet al onze volkeren, behoort een taal tot de ruggegraat van onze eigen identiteit. De burger van de Unie het recht te ontzeggen om in al zijn contacten met de Unie de officiële taal van zijn keuze te gebruiken, is kiezen voor een cultureel en taalkundig opgedeeld Europa met eerste klas en tweede klas talen, en eerste klas en tweede klas burgers. Het is ook kiezen voor een sociale opdeling tussen enerzijds Engelstaligen of veeltaligen, en anderzijds de anderstaligen. Deze keuze kan de Conventie niet maken. Het gaat om een belangrijke keuze. Daarom moet dit artikel, dit recht, toegevoegd worden. Het staat niet in het Charter van de fundamentele rechten van de burger, dus dat kan geen argument zijn om het niet op te nemen in artikel 7, lid 2. <BRK>

Thorning-Schmidt (PE). – I should like to make a few remarks in appreciation of this document. I am delighted that for the first time, in the objectives of the Union, we have children's rights. If this reference remains all through the Convention, that will mean that 90 million children and young people will no longer be invisible in our treaties. That is a very good thing. I have some constructive criticisms as well.

One of the fundamental things we have to agree on today, and in our future work, is a common understanding of the work we are doing. That understanding should be that it is unacceptable to go back on the acquis - not only on the legislation that is part of the acquis, but also on the policies that are established by the Union. It is quite surreal that some of our time today has been spent on establishing what are already our policies and making sure that they are part of the new treaty that we write. It should be obvious that we cannot go back on the acquis, but I am worried that is not the case.

I should therefore like to ask the President a question. As he has left, I will address it to the Praesidium. How will we make sure that it is still the case, for example, in the new treaty that one of our goals is to ensure a high level of consumer protection? How will we make sure that – as Mrs Van Lancker said earlier – equal rights between men and women are a horizontal objective? How will we make sure that these things are still the case? I cannot see it in this document. You have to tell us at some stage whether we have to keep arguing about this or whether we can go for new ground and start arguing about the more ambitious goals of the Union. It is not right that we keep talking about all the things that are already part of the treaty. <BRK>

President. – To be clear, that is the reason why we chose to show you, first, all the different texts and only come back with an amended text when we have seen them all and come up with a global text, so that you can then see the whole treaty and see if your concerns are met.

The point where the Praesidium started was to maintain the acquis and so we will have to verify, when we have the whole treaty, if you find it there. Some of these points will be in the second part, and so on. <BRK>

Söderman, Ombudsman. – I have worked seven-and-a-half years with the grievances of European citizens about the Community institutions and bodies. I am happy that I can share some concerns with you and make some very practical proposals.

First, in Article 5, it is a very good idea to make the Charter binding. It could be given a clearer position, but this is enough. This is a very positive step forward because the Union could accede to the European Convention on Human Rights. But as the article is currently drafted, it does not include the possibility to accede to other international human rights conventions, as the Member States can do. The Council of Europe has the Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment. It has a social charter. The United Nations has two international covenants on human rights. The international aid organisations also have human rights instruments to which it would be very important for the Union to accede. So this should be reverted.

Concerning Article 7, it is very good that you have explicitly written in citizens' rights. I would be glad if good administration could be included here, because citizens feel that the Union is very bureaucratic.

Finally, I support the idea to include in the principles from the Amsterdam Treaty: that the European Union must take its decisions as openly as possible and as close to the citizens as possible. This is very important for the citizens. <BRK>

Dammeyer, Ausschuss der Regionen. - Herr Präsident! Ein wichtiges Prinzip der Europäischen Union ist, und das ist hier auch wiederholt betont worden, dass die Europäische Union Respekt vor den Strukturen der Mitgliedstaaten hat. Das kann sich auf unterschiedliche Weise äußern; dazu zählt sprachliche Vielfalt, die respektiert werden soll, dazu zählt, dass das Prinzip der lokalen und regionalen Autonomie beachtet werden soll. Es wäre gut, wenn die Charta des Europarates von der Europäischen Union berücksichtigt wird. Sicher ist das möglich, sobald die Europäische Union ihrerseits Rechtspersönlichkeit geworden ist, wenn wir es schon nicht in die Verfassung selber aufnehmen.

Dazu gehört auch, dass die Regionen, wenn sie entsprechende Kompetenzen haben, auch von der Europäischen Union als zuständige und legitimerweise handelnde Partner, als Mithandelnde im Kontext ihrer Mitgliedstaaten respektiert werden sollen. Das hat auch Laeken verlangt, und deshalb sollte auf jeden Fall die Region in Artikel 2 erwähnt werden. Wenn davon die Rede ist, dass die

Kompetenzen der Mitgliedstaaten im Vergleich zur Europäischen Union beachtet werden, dann ist auch anzufügen, dass gegebenenfalls diese Kompetenzen in Übereinstimmung mit verfassungsrechtlichen Bestimmungen der Mitgliedstaaten auch von Regionen wahrgenommen werden. Das ist als erstes und vor allem eine innerstaatliche Angelegenheit, das ist wahr, aber es ist auch nötig, dass die Europäische Union das in ihrer Verfassung respektiert.

Für den Ausschuss der Regionen muss ich bedauern, dass nicht alle unsere Änderungsanträge, die wir vorgelegt haben, allen Mitgliedern vorgelegt und verteilt wurden. Ich glaube schon, dass das nützlich und richtig wäre, damit alle Kolleginnen und Kollegen wissen, welches unsere Änderungsanträge sind. Ich möchte das Sekretariat dringend darum bitten, Artikel 4 Absatz 1 und Absatz 2 der Geschäftsordnung künftig zu beachten, und ich bitte das Präsidium, unsere Änderungsanträge auch zu respektieren. Das ist auch deshalb wichtig, weil zu den Themen unserer Anträge eine Vielzahl von parallelen Änderungsanträgen anderer Mitglieder vorgelegt wurden, die in die gleiche Richtung gehen wie unsere und die wir auch deshalb berücksichtigt wissen möchten. Wir sehen uns damit in Übereinstimmung mit einer Mehrzahl dieser Mitglieder des Konvents, und wir möchten das auch gerne aufrecht erhalten. <BRK>

Brussels, 8 April 2003 (15.04)*(OR. fr)*CONV 674/03*COVER NOTE

---

Subject : Summary report of the additional plenary session
– Brussels, 26 March 2003

DISCUSSION ON THE AMENDMENTS RELATING TO ARTICLES 1 TO 7 OF THE DRAFT CONSTITUTION

Following the plenary session of 27 February dealing with Articles 1 to 7 of the draft Constitution and the amendments tabled by Convention members, the Convention continued its discussions at an additional session chaired by Mr Jean-Luc Dehaene, Vice-Chairman of the Convention.

Article 1

The Vice-Chairman briefly introduced the discussion by referring to the progress of proceedings at the plenary session at which these articles had been discussed and in particular recalling the main topics on which members of the Convention had submitted amendments. He also stated that the Praesidium would in any event seek to produce a revised version more clearly reflecting some of the concerns expressed; in particular, he cited the fact that the Union's competences were conferred by the Member States and not by the Constitution. This suggestion was welcomed by several Convention members.

"Peoples" or "citizens"

Many speakers indicated their preference for the term "citizens" rather than "peoples" in this paragraph, arguing that it was the more modern term, having been sanctioned by the Maastricht Treaty. By the same token, some speakers stressed the fact that the term "citizen" had a real legal sense, whereas the same could not be said for "peoples". However, others pointed out that the term "peoples" more accurately reflected the fundamental nature of the Union to which this Article referred. Finally, some speakers proposed rewording this paragraph to reconcile the two concepts of "peoples" and "citizens".

"Constitution" v "Constitutional Treaty"

Some speakers voiced a preference for avoiding the word "Constitution" and replacing it by "Constitutional Treaty", which more accurately reflected the idea of an agreement reached between States.

Establishment of the Union

Some speakers wondered whether legal continuity was guaranteed if the Constitution provided for "establishment" of the Union. In their view, it was not a case of establishing a Union because the Union already exists, but rather of marking a new stage in its development. The Vice-Chairman explained, firstly, that the Union established by the Constitution would in any event succeed the Community and the current Union and, secondly, that provisions guaranteeing legal continuity would be found in the last part of the Constitution, under the Title "Final provisions". One speaker emphasised the importance of reflecting legal continuity from Article 1 onwards, so as to avoid any ambiguity.

"Federal basis"

Some speakers were in favour of deleting the word "federal" in this paragraph.

These speakers expressed the view that the word "federal" had a different legal meaning in different languages and that it was therefore best avoided so as not to open up the possibility of divergent interpretations. One speaker proposed deleting the second part of the sentence (which reads: "within which the policies of the Member States shall be coordinated, and which shall administer certain common competences on a federal basis"), on the grounds that it was superfluous and devoid of substance. Others were in favour of maintaining this provision and the term "federal", believing that this term expressed more precisely and concisely than others the very specific way in which the Union operates in terms of some of its competences. Some speakers proposed replacing the word "federal" by "Community" or "supranational".

"Ever closer union"

Some Convention members advocating incorporating into this paragraph the concept of the ever closer Union which appears in the current Article 1 of the Treaty. One speaker suggested that an appropriate place for this concept was the Preamble to the Constitution, since it was intended to look towards the future. One Convention member said she saw a link between this issue and the question of the term "federal basis": she would be able to accept that expression provided the Constitution no longer included the expression "ever closer union".

Drafting points

Some members described the opening formula of Article 1 as "banal" and made alternative suggestions such as "...determined to build their future together". Moreover, the verb "administer" was criticised as being too bureaucratic.

Structure of the paragraph

Some speakers proposed inverting the order of the second part of the sentence so that the competences conferred on the Union came first, before the coordination of Member States' policies.

Article 1(2)

Several Convention members stressed the need to define more clearly the expression "national identity" in paragraph 2 of this Article and expressed doubts as to the advisability of mentioning national identity in two places in the Constitution. These members in particular proposed to make this concept more specific by adding various aspects such as cultural or linguistic diversity, autonomy and regional and other characteristics. Some speakers proposed amplifying the concept by adding the provisions of Article 9(6) or drawing up a new article on the basis of Article 1(2), supplemented by Article 9(6). However, one speaker expressed misgivings about incorporating elements of Article 9(6), fearing that the new paragraph would be overloaded.

Article 1(3)

One speaker pointed out that Article 1(3) relating to the Union's openness to other States was more mandatory in its wording of the conditions for membership than the provisions laid down for existing Member States in Article 2 on the Union's values.

At the end of the discussion on draft Article 1, the Vice-Chairman of the Convention summed up by noting, first of all, that there was a large body of opinion in favour of merging the existing drafts on national identity (Articles 1(2) and 9(6)) in a separate new article which would incorporate the various aspects of national identity set out in current Article 9(6). He said again that the Praesidium intended to draw up a formula which would express, without ambiguity, that the Union's competences came from the States and would make it clear that the Union's coordinating function was restricted to certain policies on the basis of the competences conferred on it. For the rest, he said that the Praesidium would look more closely at certain points which were still controversial, such as:

- use of the term "citizens" or "peoples" in Article 1(1);
- whether or not to use the term "federal basis" in Article 1(1).

Article 2

The Vice-Chairman introduced the discussion by explaining the logic which the Praesidium had followed in drafting this article, which was intended to be limited to a short list of the most essential values, accepted by all, and of sufficient legal clarity that serious breaches by a Member State could be sanctioned. He pointed out that a very large number of amendments set out to add equality and/or equality between men and women to the values. He also explained the Praesidium's approach to mentioning religion, referring back to Chairman Giscard d'Estaing's conclusions at the end of the last plenary session. Lastly, the Vice-Chairman noted that many amendments had raised the question of the relevance of the second sentence of this article, which was worded more as an aim than a value.

Many speakers requested that either the concept of equality in general (or in the case of some, equality before the law), or of equality between men and women, or both be added to the list of values. Several speakers argued that the term "equality" was no more general than "liberty" or "democracy" and should therefore be in line with the Praesidium's approach.

One member proposed speaking of "the inviolability" of human dignity, rather than simply respect, in line with the terminology of the Charter of Fundamental Rights. Some members also preferred the expression "fundamental rights" rather than "human rights".

Some members advocated enshrining cultural and linguistic diversity in Article 2, on the grounds that it was a true value of the Union; they did acknowledge, however, that drafting considerations could militate in favour of its inclusion in Article 3.

Several speakers took the point raised by the Vice-Chairman relating to the current wording of the second sentence and asked that it be either merged with the first sentence or moved to the Preamble or Article 3.

As regards references to religion, some Convention members wanted to go further than the Praesidium's approach as sketched out by the Chairman and Vice-Chairman, by making a reference to God in the Constitution; several other Convention members, on the other hand, expressed their satisfaction with the Praesidium's line.

The Vice-Chairman's argument that any reference to religious and spiritual values or heritage could in any event be included only in the Preamble and not in Article 2 was generally accepted.

In conclusion, the Vice-Chairman noted that a body of opinion had emerged in favour of including equality among the values and for some this also meant a reference to equality between men and women. He also said that the Praesidium would draw up a better formula for linking the two sentences in current draft Article 2.

Article 3

The Vice-Chairman briefly introduced the discussion on this article, reminding members of the state of play on the subject, as expressed both at the plenary session and by means of the amendments submitted by Convention members. He raised certain points on which there already seemed to be a degree of consensus, such as the need to express more fully the aims of environmental protection and improvement and of sustainable development and the need for a more open and less "Euro-centric" wording of paragraph 4 on the Union's role in the world, aligning it on the wording arrived at by Working Group VII. He also pointed out that the wording of the article should allay both the concerns of those who wanted to express the characteristics of the social market economy and of those who advocated an open market and free competition. Moreover, the Vice-Chairman indicated that a "mainstreaming" clause (taking into account in all the Union's policies the requirements of equality between the sexes and environmental protection) would in any event be included in the Constitution, but that there was room for discussion on the appropriate place for such a clause (Part One or Part Two of the Constitution). Finally, he stressed that, despite all the suggested additions, the article should be kept fairly concise.

Some speakers made the general point that the objectives set out in Article 3 would be used by the Court of Justice, and consequently needed to be worded more clearly. It was commented that there should be a direct link between the Union's competences and its objectives and that objectives should not be mentioned if the Union did not have the competence to achieve them. Several Convention members endorsed the appeal by the Vice-Chairman to keep the wording of the article concise.

Some Convention members felt it was superfluous to include in Article 3(1) concepts such as peace and other values already covered in Article 2.

Others regretted the failure to adopt the principles that the Union's action should be as open as possible and as close as possible to its citizens, and proposed that a separate paragraph be added including those principles.

Finally, several Convention members asked for a "mainstreaming" or consistency clause, as also mentioned by the Vice-Chairman, to be inserted either in this article or in Part Two.

Article 3(2)

Many speakers welcomed the indication given by the Vice-Chairman that environmental protection and improvement and sustainable development in its various aspects might be more forcibly expressed, and submitted concrete drafting proposals to that effect.

- Several speakers called for a reference to both an "open market economy with free competition", as enshrined in current Article 4 TEC and a reference to the "social market economy", and the Convention members pointed out that the two concepts were not mutually exclusive. Moreover, referring to the conclusions of Working Group XI, some Convention members mentioned various aspects of the social market economy such as public health protection, combating social exclusion, promoting the quality of work and/or access to education and training, and high-quality services of general interest.

Several speakers wanted to add the idea of territorial cohesion. In that context, the point was made that such an addition would inevitably have consequences for the definition, in Part Two, of the structural funds policy, currently intended to promote economic and social cohesion only.

Lastly, some speakers suggested including a reference to the promotion of non-discrimination, especially in the fields currently covered by Article 13 TEC.

Article 3(3)

A series of speakers pointed out that since cultural diversity was not specifically linked to the area of freedom, security and justice, it should be mentioned separately. Others, in contrast, suggested enhancing the enshrinement of the area of freedom, security and justice by mentioning some of its constituent elements, notably the fight against racism and xenophobia which they thought should be included either here or in Part Two of the Treaty.

Some Convention members stressed the importance of adding the concept of linguistic diversity to that of cultural diversity; in this context, one speaker also added the idea of respect for the rights of minorities. The proposal to add the concept of a common cultural heritage in order to maintain the balance of Article 151(1) TEC was positively received.

Article 3(4)

Several speakers called for a more open and less defensive wording of this paragraph, based on the drafts suggested by Working Group VII. One Convention member questioned the concept of "the Union's independence". Those Convention members thought that reference should be made to respect for international law, the principles of the United Nations Charter and to fundamental rights in general, which some members thought should cover the reference to children's rights. The Vice-Chairman accepted that this paragraph ought to be redrafted along those lines, as already revised by the Working Group. Some speakers did not want objectives such as the protection of children's rights or the eradication of poverty to be linked to the defence of the Union's independence and interests in the world, so that account could also be taken of them internally.

Some Convention members explicitly wanted Article 3(4) to contain the definition and implementation by the Union of a common foreign and security policy and a common defence policy. Others pressed for a reference to the promotion of free trade.

One speaker proposed that, in this article, the Union reject war as a means of resolving international disputes.

Article 4

The Vice-Chairman opened the debate by saying that a relatively broad consensus had been reached on the draft article at the Convention plenary session. A very brief discussion on this point ensued.

One speaker emphasised the fact that approval of this article did not preclude the existence of special arrangements concerning the common foreign and security policy and certain aspects of Justice and Home Affairs.

Another speaker also insisted that the legal personality of the Union could not, in his view, turn the Union into a federation.

Article 5 to 7

In his introduction, the Vice-Chairman said that although several Convention members had called for the legal basis of Article 5(2) to be extended to include accession to other international conventions in the field of human rights, the Praesidium took the view that the current draft, which mentioned only the ECHR, should not be understood a contrario as ruling out accession to other conventions. This clause was necessary for the ECHR, in the light of the opinion of the Court of 1996, which rejected competence to accede to the ECHR on the ground that such accession "would be of constitutional significance"; on the other hand, in the case of other conventions in the field of human rights which did not have such "significance" and with linkage to the Union's competences, the existing legal bases in the Treaty (and included in Part Two) should suffice.

Moreover, as regards the calls to add other forms of discrimination to the current draft Article 6 on non-discrimination on grounds of nationality, the Vice-Chairman called for caution, considering that such an addition could have much wider legal consequences than the prohibition of discrimination contained in Article 21(1) of the Charter, the scope of which is clearly limited by Article 51 of the Charter.

Lastly, the Vice-Chairman raised the matter of potential duplication between Articles 6 and 7(2) (list of citizens' rights), on the one hand, and the text of the Charter, on the other, inviting the members to take a position on the choice of principle that had to be made in that respect.

During the discussion on Articles 5 to 7, the following points were covered:

- A suggestion was made to incorporate, in Title II, a new article devoted to the four fundamental freedoms on the grounds that the vital importance of those freedoms to European integration would justify their inclusion in the initial articles of the Constitution; this importance had more to do with the nature of fundamental rights having direct effect than the nature of the Union's competence. This proposal was welcomed by the Vice-Chairman and other Convention members.

- A number of Convention members favoured including the Charter in the actual text of the Constitution, rather than in a protocol; most of them expressed a preference either for inserting it in Part One or for the Charter to constitute Part Two. One Convention member added that in that case the preamble to the Charter could not be incorporated as such, since the Constitution could not have two preambles.
- One Convention member said that, were the Charter incorporated, the "Explanations" on the Charter should be strengthened and attached to the text of the Charter. However, the other Convention members and the Vice-Chairman, while supporting the conclusions of the Working Group on the publication of the updated Explanations, rejected the idea of attaching the Explanations to the text of the Charter in the Constitution, as that would give them the same legal value as the Charter itself. Instead, the Explanations should retain their current value, i.e. as preparatory work which could serve as a valuable instrument for interpreting the Charter.
- As regards Article 5(2), several Convention members remarked that it would be dangerous to confine it to one optional legal basis, to be used by the Council acting unanimously, which might result in accession to the ECHR being blocked. On the other hand, it was acknowledged that the Constitution could not lay down a firm obligation to accede, given that such accession would still depend on negotiations to be conducted with the Member States of the Council of Europe, and on their agreement. Support emerged and was accepted by the Vice-Chairman for wording to the effect that "the Union shall seek ..." accession to the ECHR.
- Several Convention members pointed out that the current Article 6 could be deleted if the Charter, which contains an identical provision in its Article 21(2), were included in the actual text of the Constitution. The Vice-Chairman returned to this point in his conclusions and stressed the need to examine the possibilities for avoiding duplication between Part One and the Charter.

Subject : Summary report on the plenary session
– Brussels, 30 and 31 May 2003

I. INTRODUCTION

The Chairman briefly presented the documents which had been submitted to Convention members during the days preceding the plenary session. For the first time, Convention members had an overview of the draft Constitution with its Parts I, II, III and IV and the Preamble.

The Chairman stated that the Praesidium had given a thorough reading to the texts initially submitted and made a number of amendments to them in order to take account of the amendments tabled by Convention members. The Chairman described the main changes made to the texts of the Articles.

As regards the Institutions, the text had not been amended, the Praesidium having considered that, given the number and above all the nature of the comments made by Convention members on the text, further time for reflection on this matter was required.

The Chairman then presented the Convention work programme for the next few weeks. In order to obtain maximum data for the evaluation of institutional issues, the Praesidium agreed that the Chairman and the two Vice-Chairmen would consult each of the component groups of the Convention on Wednesday 4 June. The plenary session on 5 and 6 June would be devoted to the debate on Part I of the Constitution (with the exception of institutional issues) so as to provide the Praesidium with the necessary pointers for any subsequent amendments.

Some speakers wanted provision to be made for specific procedural arrangements with regard to common foreign and security policy.

V. DEBATE ON DRAFT PART II OF THE CONSTITUTION

The incorporation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and its Preamble into Part II of the Constitution was largely endorsed by Convention members, although some would have preferred the Charter to constitute Part I, and others that it should be incorporated into a protocol annexed to the Treaty.

For several Convention members, the adaptations of the final horizontal clauses of the Charter made by Working Group II and the updating of the Praesidium's explanations are an essential condition for being able to agree on conferring a legal value upon it. Some would also like to confer a legal value on the explanations themselves, or at the very least to refer explicitly to them in the text of the Constitution. Mr Vitorino, the Chairman of the Working Group on the Charter, stated that work on updating the explanations of the Charter was under way.

VI. DEBATE ON THE DRAFT ARTICLES IN PART III OF THE CONSTITUTION

Several Convention members said they would like to be able to examine in greater depth certain questions in Part III, especially from a more technical point of view. The main questions raised at this preliminary debate were as follows:

Extension of qualified majority voting

One of the main themes discussed was the extension of qualified majority voting. A great many Convention members thought that the extension to date was not sufficient, and some said that cases subject to unanimity should be strictly limited to exceptional instances. Others pointed to the need

Brussels, 19 June 2003 (25.06)
(OR. fr,en)

CONV 814/03

NOTE

---

Subject : Summary report of the Plenary Session
– Brussels, 11 and 13 June 2003

Reaching consensus

1. On 13 June the Convention reached broad consensus on texts to be presented by the President of the Convention on its behalf to the European Council of Thessaloniki, of the Preamble, Part I on the constitutional provisions, Part II on the Charter of fundamental rights, and the Protocols on the role of national parliaments and the application of the subsidiarity and proportionality principles (CONV 797/1/03). The President recalled the mandate from the Laeken European Council and commended members of the Convention for reaching "un résultat inespéré" (a result unhoped-for).
2. After two days of debates in plenary, as well as intense negotiations within and between the different components of the Convention and political groups, the President of the Convention presented on 13 June the text as revised by the Praesidium in the light of the outcome of these discussions, introducing changes to the Preamble, to the chapter on institutions in Part I, and to Part II on the Charter; and including a new provision for a "citizens initiative" (CONV 811/03). The President highlighted that the text was the result of a collective effort to progressively identify a balance between the different expectations and sensibilities of Convention members.

3. In their interventions, members of the Convention expressed their appreciation for the final outcome and considered that it represented a fair and balanced result. Many spoke of a historic achievement. While maintaining the balance between Member States and between the Institutions, the Convention has succeeded in re-designing the Union to be more transparent and closer to the citizens, with clearer competences, and more effective and democratic decision-making. All welcomed the fact that the Convention method had succeeded in producing a single text, without options, and that improvements had been made in areas where successive IGCs had failed to produce results. Among the achievements of the Convention, speakers praised in particular the abolition of the pillar structure, the attribution of a single legal personality, the integration of the Charter, the simplification of instruments and procedures, the major strengthening of the roles of the European Parliament and national Parliaments, the extension of decision-making by QMV and lawmaking by codecision, and the creation of the post of EU Minister of Foreign Affairs.
4. Members of the Convention called on Member States not to reopen the text in the IGC as this could undermine the delicate balance reached by the Convention.
5. Notwithstanding the positive assessment of the general outcome, some speakers felt that the Convention should have reduced further the use of unanimity, in particular on taxes and CFSP issues, or were disappointed that Part I failed to mention services of general interest. Others considered that on some issues the Convention went too far, for example on structural cooperation in defence or trade in cultural services, while some expressed reservations on the definition of qualified majority.

Issues raised during the discussions

6. In addition to the issues covered above, a number of other issues were raised during the discussions in the plenary.

7. Some members felt that a clear reference to Christianity or Christian values should be included in the preamble. Others opposed this, saying that the current wording on "religious heritage" was sufficient and that they could not accept a reference to a specific religion.
8. Some considered the "passerelle" transition on QMV an infringement of the rights of national parliaments as use of it would not require ratification by Member States. Others feared that in practice it would never be used, and that continuing national vetoes would reduce the Union's capacity to act effectively. In general, members agreed on the usefulness of such a clause, given that the time was not ripe for abolition of the right of veto.
9. With regard to the Charter, a number of members expressed their surprise and reservations as to the sentence on the explanations relating to the Charter which the Praesidium had decided to insert into the Preamble to the Charter (at the beginning of Part II). The Chairman of Working Group II nevertheless defended this as a solution, which he termed a reasonable compromise, and which would not mean that the explanations as such would be accorded full legal status. Other members rallied round this position, pointing out that it was a compromise which was needed by at least five Member States so that inclusion of the Charter in the Constitution as proposed by the Praesidium could be ratified. Other members commented that, although it was a very painful concession, they were prepared to put up with this wording in the Preamble if it enabled inclusion of the Charter, but that they would nonetheless be opposed to the drafting of an article in the Constitution referring to the explanations.
10. A number of speakers argued that the Union needed a lighter treaty revision procedure which moved away from unanimity and national ratification. While highlighting the sensitivity of this issue and the need of maintaining a role for national parliaments, the President indicated that this issue could be further discussed in the context of Part IV.

11. The President finally informed the Convention that his report to the European Council would mention "areas of disagreement" where these had been expressed collectively, as was the case for the "minority report" by five members of the Convention. He would deliver their text to the President of the European Council.

Further examination of Part III and Part IV

12. The President confirmed that he would ask the European Council to extend the mandate of the Convention to allow it to finalise Parts III and IV. Members of the Convention could send amendments on these parts to the Secretariat up to Monday 23 June 13h00. Without prejudging European Council decisions, the President announced provisional plans for Plenary meetings of the Convention on 4 July and on 9-10 July.

As requested by the Chairman of the Working Group on "Incorporation of the Charter/Accession to the ECHR", the Secretariat is forwarding herewith a discussion paper examining in detail the various issues already raised in CONV 72/02, which the Group will be required to consider.

The paper is divided into three sections:

- The first section gives a brief description of the background and current legal situation with regard to the protection of fundamental rights in the Community legal system, the current status of the Charter and the question of Community accession to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).
- The second section presents an analysis, together with questions to guide the Working Group's discussions, of the various options and modalities for possible incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties and of the consequences thereof. In this context it also addresses the question of actions before the Community courts.
- The third section contains an analysis and questions relating to the modalities and consequences of possible accession of the Community or the Union to the ECHR.

Discussion paper

Subject: Modalities and consequences of incorporation into the Treaties of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and accession of the Community/Union to the ECHR

I. Background and current situation

1. Fundamental rights in the Community legal system

For some 30 years the case-law of the Court of Justice has acknowledged that fundamental rights form part of Community law as general principles of this law <sup>1</sup>. In the absence of a written catalogue specific to the Union, the Court has derived the content of these laws through case-law, taking as a basis various sources, especially the constitutional traditions common to the Member States and the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR), which has been ratified by all the Member States. For several years, the Court of Justice has noted that the ECHR has "special significance" in this respect, and refers explicitly to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights <sup>2</sup>. It has also stated that not only the institutions of the Union but also the States, where they act within the scope of Community law, are required to respect fundamental rights under the supervision of the Court <sup>3</sup>.

The Treaty of Maastricht included a provision in the Treaty on European Union – current Article 6(2) of that Treaty – which confirmed this case-law acquis. The Treaty of Amsterdam adds to it the provision of Article 6(1) enshrining the founding principles of the Union, including respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms; it also stipulates that respect for such principles is a condition for accession to the Union (Article 49 TEU) and establishes the possibility for the Union to impose sanctions on one of its Member States in the event of a serious and persistent breach of those principles (Article 7 TEU).

2. The current status of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

Following the conclusions of the Cologne and Tampere Councils in 1999, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (hereinafter "Charter") was drawn up during 2000 by a Convention and then approved by the Biarritz European Council. It should also be pointed out that explanations regarding the text of the Charter were drawn up by the Praesidium of that Convention; it was specified that these explanations had no legal value but were intended to clarify the provisions of the Charter <sup>1</sup>. The Charter was signed and solemnly proclaimed by the Council, the European Parliament and the Commission on 7 December 2000 and published in the Official Journal <sup>2</sup>.

The Nice IGC did not give a ruling on its incorporation into the Treaties. Nice Declaration No 23 states that the debate on the future of the Union and the new IGC to be convened in 2004 will relate inter alia to "the status of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, proclaimed in Nice, in accordance with the conclusions of the European Council in Cologne". The Laeken Declaration states that "thought would [also] have to be given to whether the Charter of Fundamental Rights should be included in the basic treaty."

Since the solemn declaration, a series of Advocates-General at the Court of Justice have referred to the Charter, using it – despite its lack of any formally binding force, which they take care to note – as a source for identifying Community fundamental rights <sup>1</sup>. More recently, the Court of First Instance invoked on two occasions articles of the Charter as "confirmation" of the constitutional traditions common to the Member States <sup>2</sup>. On the other hand, the Court of Justice has refrained to date from mentioning the Charter.

Furthermore, the Commission decided in March 2001 that any proposal for a legislative act and any regulatory act that it was preparing to adopt would be the subject, at the time of its drafting according to the usual procedures, of a prior compatibility check with the Charter; in addition, a new "model recital", testifying to this compatibility check, is now inserted into its legislative proposals or regulatory acts which have a specific connection with fundamental rights. Such recitals referring to the Charter have in the meantime been included in certain acts adopted by the legislator <sup>3</sup>.

The wording of Advocate-General Léger in the abovementioned Hautala case should be noted "As the solemnity of its form and the procedure which led to its adoption would give one to assume, the Charter was intended to constitute a privileged instrument for identifying fundamental rights. It is a source of guidance as to the true nature of the Community rules of positive law."

3. The question of accession of the Community to the ECHR:

The Commission had already proposed in 1979 that the Community should accede to the ECHR; it reiterated this proposal in 1990 and in 1993<sup>1</sup>. The European Parliament endorsed this on several occasions<sup>2</sup>. Having received from the Council a request for an Opinion pursuant to Article 300(6) of the EC Treaty, the Court of Justice, in its Opinion 2/94 delivered in 1996<sup>3</sup>, noted that the Community was not competent to accede to the ECHR, since no Treaty provision conferred upon the institutions, in general, the power to lay down rules or to conclude international conventions on human rights, and that accession to the ECHR, which "would be of constitutional significance", would go beyond the limits of Article 235 (now Article 308) of the EC Treaty. According to this Opinion of the Court – which does not comment on whether accession to the ECHR would be compatible with the Treaty and in particular with the principle of the autonomy of Community law and the powers of the Court – such accession could be effected only by way of Treaty amendment.

The Amsterdam and Nice IGCs, to which initiatives along these lines were referred, did not insert a provision into the Treaty which would allow for the Community's accession to the ECHR.

The Laeken Declaration states that "thought would ... have to be given ... to whether the European Community should accede to the European Convention on Human Rights".

II. Modalities and consequences of possible incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties

Preliminary remark: The content of the Charter

In line with the Working Group's mandate the present paper, when referring to the "Charter", takes as a basis the Charter as adopted by the earlier Convention and solemnly proclaimed by the three institutions. Consequently, the proposals put forward since then for amending the Charter by deleting certain rights or by adding others are not examined here; this does not, of course, rule out the possibility of such proposals being made later, during the political debate by the Plenary of the Convention. Likewise, the "technical" criticisms or proposals for "drafting improvements" made by certain legal experts, referring for example to the lack of precision of certain articles of the Charter, will not be discussed either.

As regards the content of the Charter, here reflections will instead be limited to examining whether discussions conducted since 2000 on the technique of incorporation and, in particular, the future structure of the Treaties, have revealed any need for a technical amendment of the text of the Charter which does not affect its substance. With this in mind, three points should be noted:

- the question of what is to happen to the preamble to the Charter, if it were decided to incorporate the body of the Charter into the EU Treaty or into a new basic Treaty (see 3 below);
- the question if and to what extent certain purely technical adjustments need to be made in the provisions of the Charter in order to ensure consistency between the Charter and the existing Treaties (see 5 below);

- without looking at it in detail here, the possible need for an adjustment of a purely drafting nature to the references in the Charter to "Treaties" or to "Community Treaties", to the "Treaty on European Union", "Treaty establishing the European Community" or to "Community law", in the event of the current structure and/or title of these Treaties being modified in the course of their simplification <sup>1</sup>.

1. Possible techniques for incorporation of the Charter

If the Convention inclines towards incorporation <sup>2</sup> of the Charter into the Treaties, several options arise as regards the technique for such incorporation:

- (a) The Charter could be "attached" to the Treaties in the form of a "Solemn Declaration".
- (b) The EU Treaty or a new basic Treaty could refer to the Charter according to the model of Article 6(2) of the existing EU Treaty. It would therefore be merely an indirect <sup>3</sup> reference to the Charter as a source of inspiration for the case-law definition of fundamental rights.
- (c) The EU Treaty or a new basic Treaty could make a direct reference to the Charter <sup>4</sup>.
- (d) A direct or indirect reference to the Charter could be made in the preamble to a new basic Treaty.

<sup>1</sup> These references are to be found in the preamble to the Charter and in Articles 16, 18, 21(2), 27, 28, 30, 34, 36, 45, 51 and 52. Similarly, only where the body of the articles of the Charter were inserted into the EU Treaty itself or in a new basic Treaty (option (f) below), could a drafting adjustment of Article 51(2) of the Charter become necessary in order to make it clear that the Charter does not alter the powers and tasks as defined by the other provisions of the Treaties (and Article 52(2) of the Charter could be subject to a similar adjustment to make it clear that this Article relates to the rights of the Charter which are based on other provisions of the Treaties).

<sup>2</sup> The term "incorporation" is used here in the broad sense covering several forms and degrees of acknowledgement of the legal value of the Charter in the Treaties or in connection with them.

<sup>3</sup> The indirect nature is currently expressed in the text of Article 6(2) TEU by the terms "... fundamental rights, as guaranteed ... as general principles ..."). As to whether the reference to the Charter should be added to or replace the two current references, see section 2 below.

<sup>4</sup> Example: "The Union respects the rights, freedoms and principles enshrined in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union".

- (e) The Charter could become a new Protocol annexed to the Treaties or to a new basic Treaty.
- (f) The full body of the 54 articles of the Charter could be inserted into a title or chapter of the EU Treaty, or into a new basic Treaty, of which it would for example form the first title or chapter.

There are also various possibilities for combining options (a) to (e) (for example, "attaching" the Charter as a solemn declaration and reference in current Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty; Protocol annexed to the Treaties or to the new basic Treaty and direct reference to this Protocol in an article of the TEU/the new basic Treaty).

Several factors will influence the choice made from the techniques referred to above. Firstly, the general question whether the Convention prefers to retain the current structure of the Treaties or propose a new basic Treaty will obviously play a major role, even if each of the above techniques is in principle conceivable in both scenarios <sup>1</sup>.

Secondly, the precise legal value of the Charter would also vary according to the option chosen: It would be least pronounced under option (a), which would admittedly increase the symbolic and political value of the Charter without, however, clarifying or reinforcing its current legal status. Option (b) would go a little further than the previous option but nevertheless would merely formally acknowledge the Charter's status as a source of inspiration – although undoubtedly a distinguished source – for the case-law definition of fundamental rights as general principles of law. Such status appears already to be accepted in practice (see above). It is only by virtue of options (c), (e) and (f) that the Charter would acquire the status of a fully binding text, following the example of the catalogues of fundamental rights in national constitutions. On the other hand, the legal effect of a reference in a new preamble (option (d)) would seem rather uncertain, particularly in the light of Court of Justice case-law which grants preambles and recitals of Community acts a legal value which is only very limited and subordinate to that of the enacting terms of the act. Furthermore, if the technique of merely referring to the Charter (options (b), (c) or (d)) without incorporating the latter into a Protocol were preferred, this should lead to consideration of how the Charter could be amended in future (whereas under options (e) and (f) it would be the common arrangements for revision of the Treaties which would automatically apply).

<sup>1</sup> Consideration is not given here to whether, if the Convention were to propose a new basic Treaty (into which the Charter would be incorporated), there should or should not be a hierarchical distinction between this Treaty and a "Part Two" of the existing primary law. This question goes beyond the subject of the Charter and should be examined by the Convention in the general context of the future structure of the Treaties.

Finally, the choice between the abovementioned options could also be informed by the preferences of the Convention members regarding the political presentation and legibility of the rights of the Charter, and of the outcome of the Convention as a whole, in the eyes of the citizen.

Which of the techniques mentioned above is (are) deemed preferable?

2. The question of the current Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty

If the Charter is incorporated into the Treaties (irrespective of the technique chosen) the question arises whether or not a reference should be kept, as currently in Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty, to the two outside sources of legal inspiration – the constitutional traditions common to the Member States and the ECHR. There are valid arguments on both sides here. For example, retaining such a clause – even if it were worded differently –<sup>1</sup> could be justified on the grounds that it makes it clear that the Charter will not prevent the Court of Justice from continuing to draw on these additional sources, which may also develop over time. The argument is also put forward that to retain a reference to the ECHR in the Treaty would be a desirable addition, from the point of view of legal certainty, to the reference to the ECHR in Article 52(3) of the Charter. Furthermore, deletion of current Article 6(2) TEU could be defended on the grounds that the Charter now constitutes the most authentic expression of the body of acquired fundamental rights specific to the European Union. According to that view, a "concurrent" reference to the other two sources would scarcely be comprehensible, since the Charter has already incorporated the rights in the ECHR and crystallises most fully the traditions common to the Member States<sup>1</sup>; nor would such a reference be necessary since, as in other constitutional legal systems, a written catalogue of fundamental rights would not be understood as "exhaustive" and preventing the development, through case-law, of new rights when the times so demand.

<sup>1</sup> In the case of options (a) and (b), the expression "and as they are recognised in the Charter ..." could be added to Article 6(2). In the case of option (c), (d) or (e), a second sentence reading as follows could be added to the sentence suggested in footnote 4 on page 7 above: "The Union shall also observe fundamental rights as guaranteed ..." (followed by the current content of Article 6(2) TEU). While option (f) sits less easily with retaining a provision such as Article 6(2) TEU, it would not be out of the question, for example, to add such a provision to the new heading, just after the last article of the Charter, or to insert a reference of the type "notwithstanding ...." in the latter's horizontal provisions.

Should incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties lead to deletion of the reference to the two outside sources represented by the constitutional traditions common to the Member States and the ECHR (see the current Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty)? Or should such a reference be kept? In the affirmative, how should it be reworded in the light of incorporation of the Charter?

3. The question of the preamble to the Charter

The articles of the Charter are preceded by a preamble, certain aspects of which played an important role in achieving the final compromise in the previous Convention. If the European Convention were to choose option (e) above, the question would arise of what should become of the preamble. It would then be conceivable to use the preamble to the Charter as the basis for drafting the preamble to a new basic Treaty or, alternatively, to incorporate its different aspects into a reformulated preamble to the EU Treaty. This question does not arise in relation to the other options, which would leave the preamble to the Charter attached to the Charter text.

What should be done with the preamble to the Charter if the Charter is incorporated into the Treaties?

4. The question of "replication" in the Charter

In order to draw up a full catalogue of the fundamental rights of the Union, the Charter, in a number of its articles, simply restates rights already expressly enshrined in the EC Treaty, often, however, in the interests of readability, shortening the wording as compared with the corresponding articles of the Treaty. These relate to rights to freedom of movement <sup>1</sup>, almost all the rights in the "citizenship" section of the Charter (right to vote, access to documents, right of petition, etc.) <sup>2</sup> and the clauses relating to non-discrimination on grounds of nationality and equality between the sexes <sup>3</sup>. Since the previous Convention had no brief to amend the Treaties, but only to draft a Charter which could be added to them, it formulated a referral clause (Article 52(2) of the Charter <sup>4</sup>) to make it clear that, with regard to those rights, the legal situation as defined in the Treaties was unaffected by the Charter. That clause also made it possible to avoid the repetition, in each Charter article in question, of formulae to the effect that these rights are exercised under the conditions and within the limits provided for in the corresponding article of the Treaty and of secondary legislation <sup>5</sup>.

If the option of integrating the body of the Charter into a new basic Treaty or a protocol annexed thereto (options (e) and (f)) were to be considered, some have suggested that the question would then arise whether the "replications" mentioned above between some of the Charter articles and the same rights recognised in the Treaties should be eliminated, either by deleting either the Charter articles in question or the corresponding articles from the current Treaties (which would then become the "second part" of primary legislation). However, others have commented that this

<sup>4</sup> Article 52(2) reads as follows: "Rights recognised by this Charter which are based on the Community Treaties or the Treaty on European Union shall be exercised under the conditions and within the limits defined by those Treaties."

<sup>5</sup> On this point, see also the explanations of the Praesidium (cited in footnote 1 on page 3) relating to this Article ("Paragraph 2 specifies that where a right results from the Treaties it is subject to the conditions and limits laid down by them. The Charter does not alter the system of rights conferred by the Treaties.") problem is more apparent than real or that in any event it would arise only in relation to a very limited number of rights<sup>1</sup>. This question will have to be examined in greater detail if the occasion arises.

If the corpus of the articles of the Charter were to be incorporated into the new basic treaty or a protocol annexed thereto (option e), how should the "replication" arising from the fact that some articles of the Charter repeat rights already enshrined in the EC Treaty be dealt with?

5. Examination of certain technical adjustments in the provisions of the Charter

Some observers have suggested that, if the Charter is incorporated, certain technical adjustments to its wording would be needed. Other observers have challenged the need for these changes, taking the view that the general provisions of the Charter (Articles 51 to 54) are sufficient to clarify the points dealt with.

On the one hand, the criticism has been levelled that some articles of the Charter repeat rights enshrined in the EC Treaty without specifying in each article that those rights are exercised under the conditions and within the limits laid down by the Treaty, which would lead to legal uncertainty<sup>2</sup>. Others hold that the horizontal provision of Article 52(2) of the Charter was designed to clarify this issue for all the articles of the Charter, while avoiding the cumbersome repetition, in each article in question, of references to the Treaty. On the other hand, it has been held that some provisions of the Charter took over those of the TEC, but with changes to them. In this connection reference is made to Article 21(1) of the Charter, on non-discrimination, which some claim modifies Article 13 of the EC Treaty; others point out, however, that there is no incompatibility between these two provisions, as they are different in nature and scope <sup>1</sup>.

In the event of incorporation of the Charter being integrated into the Treaties, would certain technical adjustments to some of its provisions be necessary? Would Article 52(2) of the Charter be sufficient or would it be necessary to make repeated reference to the conditions and limits laid down in the Treaty in each Article concerned in the Charter?

6. Treaty provisions concerning the Court of Justice

In this connection, there are three distinct issues, only the first of which arises directly as a consequence of the possible incorporation of the Charter, while the other two exist independently of it in principle even though a link has often been established:

(a) Amendment of Article 46(d) of the TEU

Depending on the option chosen for the incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties (see above), a change to the wording of Article 46(d) of the EU Treaty could prove necessary in order to ensure that the Charter is included among the provisions over which the Court has jurisdiction.

At the same time, it appears that the words "with regard to action of the institutions" in the current Article 46(d) should be deleted. As noted earlier, since the 1980s the Court of Justice has monitored compliance with fundamental rights not only by the action of the institutions, but also by that of the authorities of the Member States where they act within the scope of Community law. The significance of inserting the above terms into Article 46 of the EU Treaty by means of the

<sup>1</sup> Thus, while Article 13 TEC creates a legal basis to combat discrimination by adopting legislative provisions applying between individuals, Article 21(1) of the Charter contains a directly applicable ban on discrimination comparable to Article 14 ECHR and Protocol No 12 thereto, but binding only on the institutions and bodies of the Union and on the Member States solely when implementing Union law.

Amsterdam Treaty in relation to that well established case-law was never very clear; nevertheless, the Court confirmed its established case-law following the entry into force of the Amsterdam Treaty. In any event, the earlier Convention was at pains to define its scope explicitly, in Article 51(1) of the Charter <sup>1</sup>, by codifying earlier case-law; the current wording of Article 46(d), which could be interpreted differently with the Charter, should then give way to this definition.

Should the reference to action of the institutions alone in Article 46 of the EU Treaty be deleted in the event of that article being adapted to a Charter incorporated into the Treaties?

(b) competences of the Court in the field of justice and home affairs

While the provisions of the Treaty of Amsterdam introducing jurisdiction for the Court of Justice with regard to justice and home affairs reflect progress, many criticise the remaining limitations and the complexity of these rules in relation to the common arrangements of the EC Treaty <sup>2</sup>. Thus, Article 35 of the EU Treaty has led to extremely complex "variable geometry" arrangements with regard to the preliminary ruling procedure under the 3rd pillar. Article 35(5) of the EU Treaty completely rules out any jurisdiction of the Court over 3rd pillar matters in respect of national police or law and order measures. Provision is made for a similar exclusion, in accordance with Article 68(2) of the EC Treaty, even under the Community pillar, in respect of acts of the Community institutions against which national courts can offer no protection. Finally, the limitation of the right of preliminary referral provided for in Article 68(1) of the EC Treaty seems hard to justify since it obliges those concerned to go through all the national courts before they can be heard by the Community judge.

<sup>1</sup> Article 51(1) of the Charter reads as follows: "The provisions of this Charter are addressed to the institutions and bodies of the Union with due regard for the principle of subsidiarity and to the Member States only when they are implementing Union law. They shall therefore respect these rights, observe the principles and promote the application thereof in accordance with their respective powers." (Our italics).

<sup>2</sup> On these points, see also discussion paper CONV 69/02 on "Justice and Home Affairs".

It is clear that this problem goes beyond the issue of incorporating the Charter <sup>1</sup>. However, effective protection of fundamental rights is considered to be an essential aspect of the "area of freedom, security and justice", especially insofar as many actions of the Union in this area are particularly sensitive with regard to those rights. Moreover, any exemption from control by the Court of Justice would expose Union law and the acts of the institutions to appeal before the European Court of Human Rights.

Could concern for the protection of fundamental rights give rise to a review of the current provisions relating to the Court of Justice in matters relating to justice and home affairs ?

- (c) The question of liberalising the conditions for direct action before the Court or even introducing a "constitutional appeal" (Verfassungsbeschwerde", "recurso de amparo")

For some time, some legal scholars have criticised the conditions for direct appeal by individuals to the Community jurisdiction, as defined in Article 230(4) of the EC Treaty and interpreted by case-law <sup>2</sup>, as being too narrow or inadequate for guaranteeing the fundamental right to effective judicial protection (or: "right to seise a judge") against acts of the institutions. While this criticism was voiced independently of the Charter and prior to its drafting – the latter does not codify the right to appear before a judge, as developed by the Court of Justice on the basis of the ECHR since the 1980s <sup>3</sup> – it has been reiterated in connection with it. Some have even gone so far as to call for the introduction of a new special form of legal action enabling any individual to challenge directly any Community act, including those of a legislative nature, for violation of his or her fundamental rights, along the lines of procedures that exist in some Member States (Verfassungsbeschwerde", "recurso de amparo").

<sup>2</sup> Article 230(4) TEC restricts actions for annulment to persons to whom a Community act is addressed and to persons to whom it is "of direct and individual" concern. Since the Plaumann judgment, Case 25/62, ECR 197, case-law has interpreted this phrase as ruling out, in principle, action against acts that are general in scope, even where they directly affect individuals, since the person bringing a case would not be individually concerned unless they are affected "by reason of certain attributes which are peculiar to them or by reason of circumstances in which they are differentiated from all other persons, and by virtue of these factors distinguishes them individually just as in the case of the person addressed."

Others claim that Community law possesses a comprehensive appeal system providing effective judicial protection, including for fundamental rights: individuals may, according to circumstances, either challenge a Community act directly, in accordance with Article 230(4) of the EC Treaty, or bring an action before a national court against measures implementing the Community act, the national court being in a position – or under an obligation, in the latter case – to make a preliminary referral to the Court (Article 234 of the EC Treaty) in order to check the validity of the Community act. It then lies with the Member States, under Article 10 of the EC Treaty, to contribute to this dual system of protection by making provision for legal remedies at national level that leave no gaps in this indirect control of the acts of the institutions<sup>1</sup>. It has also been observed that a new form of legal action based on the violation of fundamental rights would be difficult to distinguish from other legal actions since these rights may be adduced in nearly every dispute. Critics retort that the "detour" via the national court and the preliminary ruling procedure do not always provide sufficient guarantees, partly because referral to the Court of Justice may be slow and it is not in the hands of the applicant.

A specific case which has in the meantime been very broadly recognised as problematic is where Community law introduces a ban that is directly applicable without the need for a national implementing act. The only option for an individual wishing to assert his or her rights against such a ban is to appeal against the sanction which might be applied by national authorities in the event of violation of Community law. Many believe that it is unreasonable for an individual to be induced to commit an infringement in order to have a right of appeal because he has no right of direct legal action against the Community instrument in question. In a recent judgment<sup>2</sup> concerning precisely such a case, the Court of First Instance, departing from previous case-law, which it deemed too restrictive, admitted an action by an individual, invoking the right to seise a judge. Recent conclusions by Advocate-General Jacobs in case C-50/00 P<sup>3</sup> criticised in more general terms the interpretation of Article 230(4) of the EC Treaty by traditional case-law. It is therefore possible that a significant change may be in the making in case-law relating to the admissibility of direct legal actions by individuals.

Should Article 230(4) of the EC Treaty be amended to extend the conditions of admissibility for direct actions by individuals? If so, how? Or would it be better to allow case-law to define the conditions of admissibility, taking into account the right to effective judicial protection?

Would it be appropriate to establish a new direct form of legal action to protect the fundamental rights of individuals, along the lines of certain national constitutional procedures? What consequences would an amendment to the Treaty on this issue have for the organisation and operation of the Community's judicial system?

III. Modalities and consequences of possible accession by the Community/Union to the ECHR

Preliminary remark: complementarity between the Charter and the idea of accession to the ECHR

Firstly, an observation made by many institutions and prominent persons must be borne in mind, namely that the elaboration of the Charter and the proposal for accession to the ECHR by the Community (or in future by the Union, once its legal personality has been recognised) are complementary and not alternative initiatives<sup>1</sup>: on the one hand, the existence of the Charter does not in any way detract from the assumed benefits of making the external control mechanism established by the ECHR applicable to the Union; and on the other, accession to the ECHR would not reduce the usefulness to the Union of having its own catalogue of fundamental rights, all the more so since the ECHR allows the contracting parties to go beyond the rights which it ensures (Article 53 of the ECHR), and since the manner in which the relationship between the ECHR and the Charter is expressed in the text of the latter has been judged satisfactory<sup>2</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> On this subject, see the Commission communication of 11 October 2000 (COM(2000)644 final, paragraph 9); the speeches by Mr Wildhaber, President of the European Court of Human Rights ("The Council of Europe has always regarded those two options as complementary rather than as alternatives.") and by Mr Rodríguez Iglesias, President of the Court of Justice, on 31 January 2002; and the speech by Mr Krüger, Secretary-General of the Council of Europe, on 18 March 2002.

<sup>2</sup> See Mr Wildhaber in his speech mentioned above; also Mr Rodríguez Iglesias as above ("Thus, rather than competing with each other and creating a schism in the protection of fundamental rights in Europe, the Convention and the Charter should serve to enrich one another"), and the comments by the Council of Europe observers on the final draft of the Charter, CHARTE 4961/00 CONTRIB 356 of 13 November 2000, and by the Commission in the communication mentioned above.

1. The arguments for and against accession

Rather than rehearsing in detail the arguments exchanged in the course of a debate which has been going on for more than twenty years, this document will merely very briefly recall the main arguments<sup>1</sup>. The advocates of accession stress above all that it would increase the protection of fundamental rights, by extending to the actions of the Union's institutions the same external judicial control mechanism to which all the Member States are already subject. In their view, filling this gap in protection seems increasingly urgent given the steady transfer of competences from the Member States to the Union, and also to avoid contradictions as regards the commitments required from the candidate countries by the Union. The Union's accession would also be the best way to avoid "new divides in Europe" between two systems of protecting fundamental rights, by ensuring the harmonious development of the case-law of the two European Courts.

The main concern of the opponents of accession to the ECHR is that it would be incompatible with the principle of the autonomy of Community law, including the position of the Court of Justice as the sole arbiter of that law. This question will be examined in more detail below. Another argument which is sometimes put forward is that it would not be appropriate for the Union to be subject to control by judges who are not nationals of the Union, and who might lack comprehension of the special nature of European integration.

In the light of the arguments on both sides, would accession to the ECHR have the effect of strengthening the authority and credibility of Union law and its jurisdiction, or of weakening it?

<sup>1</sup> See the arguments put forward by the various parties before the Court of Justice during the proceedings leading to Opinion 2/94, ECR [1996] I-1772 et seq.; see also the report on the Charter of Fundamental Rights by the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Union dated 24 May 2000, paragraphs 104 to 112 (summary of the evidence given on this subject to the Committee).

2. Modalities of accession

(a) At Union level

In accordance with Opinion 2/94 of the Court of Justice, the Community's accession to the ECHR would require the insertion of a specific legal basis in the EC Treaty; this could be inserted, for example, in Article 303 of the EC Treaty. If the Convention were to recommend that the legal personality of the Union should be formally recognised and merged with that of the Community, this legal basis should allow accession by the Union <sup>1</sup>.

(b) At Council of Europe level

Accession by the Community/Union to the ECHR would in any case also require an amendment to the ECHR, necessarily to its Article 59 which currently restricts the circle of contracting parties to the members of the Council of Europe (which may only be European States). It would also raise a number of other technical questions which could lead to adaptations of the Strasbourg system <sup>2</sup>.

3. The implications of accession for the principle of the autonomy of the Community legal order

Some believe that the Community's accession to the ECHR would jeopardise the principle of the autonomy of Community law. This is said to be so partly because the Court of Justice would then lose its monopoly in ruling on the validity of acts of Community law – which would from then on

<sup>1</sup> In formulating the legal basis, one would need to determine whether this provision should mention only the case of accession to the ECHR or whether it should also cover the possibility of acceding to other international human rights conventions. Rules should also be laid down concerning the decision-making procedure to be applied to the signing and conclusion of the accession agreement.

<sup>2</sup> These questions have recently been examined by an ad hoc working group within the Steering Committee for Human Rights of the Council of Europe; see the activity report by this group dated 2 April 2002 (GT-DH-EU (2002) 012).

also be monitored by the European Court of Human Rights. Also, the Court of Human Rights could also be called on to give an opinion on questions of the interpretation of Community law, for example in connection with checking the proportionality of Community acts, but also in the allocation of competences between the Union and the Member States or the exhaustion of domestic remedies. The Court of Justice would also lose its role as the sole arbiter in disputes amongst the Member States and between the Member States and the institutions, as such disputes could be brought before the Strasbourg Court by virtue of Article 33 of the ECHR. At the same time, all this would significantly weaken the political authority of the Court of Justice vis-à-vis the authorities of the Member States, including their supreme courts.

However, others contest this analysis and contend that accession would be perfectly compatible with the autonomy of Community law. They point out that the Strasbourg Court has no power to reverse or declare invalid the instruments of the contracting parties or judgments by their supreme courts, but can only note violations of the ECHR, the practical consequences of this for their domestic legal systems remaining within the competence of the institutions of the contracting parties. They also point out that domestic law is not taken into account by the Strasbourg Court except as a question of fact, and that in judging the proportionality of national acts the Court allows some leeway which would also make it possible to take account of the specific nature of Community law. The Strasbourg Court cannot therefore be described as a "superior" court in relation to the supreme courts of the contracting parties, but simply as a more specialised body which exercises subsidiary external control, with the Court of Justice having already admitted the possibility of subjecting the Union to such external control <sup>1</sup>. As for the risk of appeals between the Community and the Member States, or amongst the Member States, being taken to the Strasbourg Court, one might suppose that this would in any case be prohibited by Community law <sup>2</sup>; but a specific clarification at the time of any accession agreement, for example by means of a declaration in which the Community/Union and the Member States would renounce their right to bring appeals between the States to the Strasbourg Court, might seem desirable.

<sup>1</sup> See Opinion 1/91 of the Court of 14 December 1991, ECR [1991] I-6079, point 40: "The Community's competence in the field of international relations ..... necessarily entails the power to submit to the decisions of a court which is created or designated by such an agreement as regards the interpretation and application of its provisions".

<sup>2</sup> Taking appeals between Member States to the Strasbourg Court would be contrary to Article 292 of the EC Treaty as regards the application of Community law (appeals concerning acts not related to Community law would of course remain possible). In the same way, it could be assumed that taking disputes between the Community/Union and the Member States before that Court would violate Article 10 of the EC Treaty, as this would diverge from the procedures laid down in Articles 226 and 230 of the EC Treaty respectively.

Finally, some suggest that the continuing non-participation of the Community/Union in the Strasbourg system would itself produce risks for the Community legal order in future. It does in fact happen that Member States are held indirectly responsible before the Strasbourg Court for claimed violations of the ECHR which result in reality from acts by the institutions of the Union. This responsibility is already recognised for acts of primary legislation not subject to the control of the Court of Justice<sup>1</sup> and for applications contesting a national act which only transposes a Community Directive word for word<sup>2</sup>; an application against the 15 Member States is currently pending before the Strasbourg Court alleging that a Commission Decision on competition, confirmed by the Court of Justice, violates the ECHR<sup>3</sup>. If accession does not take place, these observers fear that increasingly often the Strasbourg Court will rule indirectly on acts of the Community/Union, without the latter being able to defend itself and without its legal system being represented by a judge within the Court, and that the Member States, responsible for this defence in the place of the Community, might argue with the latter and amongst themselves about the conformity of Community acts in relation to the ECHR.

Would accession to the ECHR harm the principle of the autonomy of the Community legal order and the role of the Court of Justice as the ultimate arbiter of that legal order? Or would it rather have positive consequences for that legal order?

The Court has not yet ruled on the admissibility of the application, which is contested by the 15 Member States who refer to the case-law of the former Commission of Human Rights (decision of 9 February 1990, M & Co v. Germany).

4. Consequences for the system of allocating competences between the Community and the Member States

In this area, two issues need to be distinguished:

Firstly, since in accordance with Opinion 2/94 of the Court of Justice, accession to the ECHR would require the inclusion in the Treaty of a specific legal basis (on its form, see below), some have said that this could have the effect of recognising a general competence<sup>1</sup> for the Community/Union in the area of fundamental rights, including at internal level. This analysis is disputed by others: since the aim and effect of accession would only be to make the institutions subject to the fundamental rights of the ECHR and to external control by the Strasbourg Court, it is difficult to see why a legal basis in the Treaty restricted to this end would give rise to a general Union competence to legislate at internal level by prescribing fundamental rights binding the Member States in their own actions. However, one might consider clarifying this point in the legal basis permitting accession, if the need was felt. Others have suggested that this question be resolved by subjecting the action of the institutions to the Strasbourg system without providing for accession (this model is presented below).

Secondly, some have pointed out that accession could lead the Strasbourg Court to rule on the Union's system of allocating competences, since it could sometimes be difficult to decide whether an issue fell under the "jurisdiction" (Article 1 of the ECHR) of the Community/Union or that of a Member State. However technical solutions, to be determined when any accession agreement was drawn up, have been suggested to avoid this situation<sup>2</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> It should be noted that while such general competence is lacking, the Community does in some areas adopt specific measures relating to fundamental rights, either on the basis of particular Articles of the Treaty (see, for example Articles 13 and 141 of the EC Treaty) or "annexed" to the exercise of the competences attributed to it (see, for example, Article 2 of Regulation No 2679/98 mentioned above (right to strike), or Regulations Nos 975/99 and 976/99 in connection with Community cooperation measures in third countries.

<sup>2</sup> In particular, following the example of the solution found in the case of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, a mechanism is proposed allowing the Community/Union to attach itself to a Member State as a co-defendant, being jointly and severally liable, and vice versa, with the addition of a declaration underlining that it would be a matter solely for the Community/Union and the Member States to decide how to allocate competences according to their internal procedures.

Would accession to the ECHR be neutral as regards the allocation of internal competences between the Union and its Member States? Would it be appropriate to devise a provision of the Treaty to clarify this neutrality, following the example of Article 51(2) of the Charter?

Is there a real risk that the Strasbourg Court would be caused to rule on the allocation of competences between the Union and the Member States? Would the proposed mechanisms make it possible to exclude this risk?

5. Alternative ways of ensuring consistency between the law of the Union and that of the ECHR

It is generally admitted that the informal contacts and exchanges existing between the two European Courts are very positive and considerably facilitate the harmonious development of their case-law. However, while many observers insist on the accession of the Community/Union as the ideal solution to ensure consistency, some have suggested developing alternative mechanisms for this purpose, of which the following are most frequently discussed:

(a) A mechanism for referral or consultation

One suggestion is to set up a mechanism for referral or consultation, making it possible for the Luxembourg Court to put to the Strasbourg Court a question of interpretation of the ECHR.

Such proposals have been made both as a measure to accompany accession to the ECHR, and as an alternative to it. In the latter case, some have suggested that the reply or opinion delivered by the Strasbourg Court could be qualified as "non-binding" on the Court of Justice. Some also assert that this mechanism would be the best way to ensure consistency between the two sets of case-law, particularly in cases where the Court of Justice is called on to rule on human rights questions in the absence of any Strasbourg case-law, and might subsequently be contradicted by Strasbourg. For those who advocate combining a referral mechanism with accession, this would also make it possible to reduce the number of individual applications to the Strasbourg Court relating to the law of the Union.

However, several objections have been raised to these proposals. Above all, it has been pointed out that such a referral mechanism would, contrary to the right to effective judicial protection, considerably delay the resolution of the main proceedings (particularly in cases where this procedure was additional to a reference for a preliminary ruling to the Court of Justice by a national court). Also, the Court of Justice would risk being placed in uncomfortable situations in which no national constitutional court ever finds itself: since it could most probably only make use of this procedure in carefully selected cases, its choice not to make a referral for a preliminary ruling to the Strasbourg Court in any particular case might always be criticised later, particularly if the Strasbourg Court then took a different line from that taken in Luxembourg. If, as an alternative to accession, Strasbourg's opinions were to be made "non-binding", the Court of Justice would still hardly be able to deviate openly from such opinions, and yet its judgments would risk being subject to discussion of the extent to which the Strasbourg opinion had actually faithfully been followed.

Finally, some suggest that an opinion or referral procedure would mix the legal systems unduly, and would have more significant effects on the autonomy of Community law than "pure and simple" accession: the Strasbourg Court would intervene directly in pending disputes by giving interpretations which would be authoritative for the Court of Justice – either de jure or at least de facto; whereas any other national constitutional court may freely assess the fundamental rights of its own legal system, with the role of the Strasbourg Court being limited to controlling ex post compliance with obligations under international law stemming from the ECHR.

Technically, the establishment of such a procedure for referral or consultation would require not only a special protocol annexed to the EC/EU Treaties but also amendments to the ECHR, as it would constitute a derogation from the normal function of the Strasbourg Court.

(b) A joint chamber

Mention should also be made of an idea which is sometimes put forward, namely that if there is no accession, the Court of Justice and the Strasbourg Court could form a "joint chamber" or "panel" which could have cases referred to it by either jurisdiction when a need was felt to ensure a uniform interpretation of fundamental rights, and especially when one Court wanted to depart from the case-law of the other. Supporters of this idea point out that it would reflect a strict equality between the two Courts and would do least damage to their current operation. However, one might wonder whether this proposal does not conflict with the rule established by the Court of Justice, stemming from the principle of the autonomy of Community law, that judges at the Court of Justice must not sit simultaneously in other jurisdictions where they would have to interpret provisions identical to those of Community law but using different approaches, methods and concepts<sup>1</sup>.

(c) Creating a right of appeal to the Strasbourg Court without acceding to the ECHR

Finally, the suggestion has been made of submitting the actions of the institutions of the Union to the individual application mechanism of the Strasbourg Court, by means of a special protocol to the EC and EU Treaties and a protocol to the ECHR, without providing for the accession of the Community/Union to the ECHR. While this model aims to create a situation which is broadly similar to that of accession as regards the position of the two Courts and the protection of individuals, the main difference would be that the Community/Union would not participate in negotiations on amendments to the ECHR or its additional protocols. Some have commented that this model would raise problems of principle for the autonomy of Community law, as well as practical complications: in effect, the institutions would be subject to the Strasbourg appeal system, without Strasbourg law formally being part of Community law (even if it may be said that the material standards of the ECHR are de facto applied in the case-law of the Court of Justice mentioned above), and that the Community/Union and its law would not, within the Strasbourg system, be treated on an equal footing with the other signatories to the ECHR.

Are the alternatives proposed to accession to the ECHR satisfactory? In particular, would it be appropriate to establish a mechanism for referral by the Court of Justice to the Strasbourg Court, either as an alternative or as a complementary measure to accession by the Community/Union to the ECHR? Or would it be preferable, if accession were to take place, to stick to the joint system (individual application to the Strasbourg Court following exhaustion of domestic remedies)?

Working group II - "Incorporation of the Charter/
accession to the ECHR"

Subject: Modalities and consequences of incorporation into the Treaties of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and accession of the Community/Union to the ECHR

Please find attached a contribution by Mr. Bobby McDonagh to the working group.

The European Convention: Working Group on the Charter

Contribution by Bobby McDonagh (alternate representative of Irish Government)

The decision of the Praesidium to establish Working Groups is an important step in the work of the Convention. It is clear that their role should be to assist the Convention by setting out the full range of options for consideration by the Convention as a whole. It would be inappropriate for a Working Group, necessarily comprising a small cross-section of the Convention's membership, to limit the deliberations of the Convention by presenting only a single preferred option.

The Working Group on the Charter should therefore identify the full range of options as regards both the Charter on Fundamental Rights and the accession of the Community/Union to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). It should explore these options including their advantages, the problems which they may give rise to and ways of addressing those problems.

3. As regards the Charter, it seems important as a first step to consider certain key questions. It will be possible to begin to assess coherently the merits of the various options- including as regards the basic political choices to be made in due course, which ought not to be pre-judged - in the light of the answers to those questions. The questions include:

(A) Could the incorporation of the Charter into the EU Treaties lead to the unintended extension of Union/Community competence, either in areas where it already has some competence or possibly across a wide range of new areas? Articles 51.2 and 52.2 of the Charter appear designed to preclude this but it is not clear that they would achieve this in the event of incorporation of the Charter into the EU Treaties. The stipulation in the Charter that the institutions and bodies of the Union should “promote the application” of its provisions- would need to be reconciled with a view that its incorporation would not involve an extension of competence. Also could the Charter impact on the exercise by EU institutions of their existing competences in areas that indirectly affected rights set out in the Charter?

(B) What is to be understood by the provision in Article 51.1 that the Charter is addressed to the Member States “only when they are implementing European law”? Given the strong emphasis on subsidiarity which has emerged at the Convention, it is important to clarify this point.

C) How is consistency to be ensured between the provisions of the Charter and (a) the existing EU/EC Treaty provisions and (b) the ECHR? Articles 52.2 and 53 of the Charter appear insufficient on their own to achieve this consistency if the Charter were incorporated in the EU/EC Treaties. The fact that similar rights are expressed in different terms in the various instruments is a significant consideration. If there are inconsistencies - for example in relation to socio-economic rights - is the judiciary to play an important role in determining policy and expenditure? As regards consistency with the ECHR, important considerations include the margin of appreciation allowed by it as well as the reservations and derogations entered by individual States. The question of defining what are to be deemed respectively “rights”, “freedoms” or “principles” under the Charter also arises.

(D) How is the potential for a conflict of jurisdiction between the Courts in Strasbourg and Luxembourg to be resolved?

(E) What would be the implications for the 2nd and 3rd Pillars of incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties?

4. It is precisely because of the importance of the rights enunciated in the Charter, as well as in the Treaties and other relevant instruments, that the Charter Working Group should address the questions identified above from the outset of its work so as to identify the most coherent and appropriate options for giving effect to those rights.
5. It will be important to draw on the expertise available in addressing these complex questions. Consideration should therefore be given to inviting the Head of the Council Legal Service, Mr Piris, as well as experts from the Council of Europe/Court of Human Rights to make known their views and to assist the Working Group in carrying out its mandate.

The Secretary-General of the Convention has received from Mr Jacques Santer, member of the Convention, the attached note from the Council of Europe, to which Mr Santer wishes to draw the attention of the members of the Convention.

800 MILLION EUROPEANS*Involving the Greater Europe in responding to key Laeken questions

The purpose of this memorandum is to propose to the members of the Convention at an early stage of their work ways in which the Council of Europe can contribute to addressing certain key questions in the Laeken Declaration:

- ❶ by building the future European Union on the solid foundations of the Council of Europe's existing instruments and institutions;
- ❷ by the accession of the EC/EU to the European Convention on Human Rights as part of a coherent approach to the effective protection of human rights in Europe;
- ❸ by developing pan-European responses to major challenges (terrorism, organised crime, drug and human trafficking, etc.);
- ❹ by providing the forum for EU foreign policy towards its immediate neighbours.

Building Europe on solid foundations of freedom and equal partnership

1.1 Shared values and principles

Created in 1949 to "achieve a greater unity between its Members for the purpose of safeguarding and realising the ideals and principles which are their common heritage", the Council of Europe now unites 44 European states in a common adherence to the values and principles of pluralist democracy, human rights and the rule of law. These include all EU member and candidate countries, as well as all other European states which have committed themselves to the same concept of a democratic society.

1.2 SHARED OBJECTIVE

The Council of Europe shares with the European Union the objective of building a peaceful, stable, democratic and prosperous Europe.

1.3 Pan-european enlargement

The European Union is preparing itself for the most far-reaching enlargement in its history and, rightly, all the candidate states are full partners in the discussions on the future of the Union of which they will be members. The Council of Europe has practically achieved its own enlargement to become a truly pan-European organisation. By next year, all European states, except Belarus – where democratic reform is still needed – will be members.

1.4 Partnership with the European Union

The political criteria laid down by the European Council in 1993 in Copenhagen were modeled on those developed by the Council of Europe in the course of its enlargement process. Furthermore, in recent years, the partnership between the Council of Europe and the European Commission has developed considerably, to providing joint assistance to candidates on the path to EU accession, in particular in the fields of institution building, justice and home affairs.

1.5 All European States on an equal footing

Even after completion of the enlargement process currently under way, almost half of the states of Europe will remain outside the European Union. Therefore, the Council of Europe will continue to be the only truly European organisation in which all European states cooperate on an equal footing.

1.6 Best use of existing structures

Building the future enlarged EU is best done on solid foundations, on existing legal frameworks and institutions. With Laeken, there is a unique opportunity to ensure a coherent architecture of interlocking European institutions. To consider how the European Union – which is the centrepiece in the European construction – may best make use of existing structures should be one of the challenging tasks of the Convention.

②

The accession of the EC/EU to the European Convention on Human Rights as part of a coherent approach to the effective protection of human rights in Europe

2.1 Protection for 800 Million Europeans

The Council of Europe is the home of Europe's main human rights conventions, the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) being the prime example. Its rights and freedoms are common to all European states and its international control mechanism offers protection for 800 Million Europeans. It is significant that the ECHR was the principal reference point for the preparation of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights as regards the human rights provisions. Social and economic rights developed within the Union were influenced by the Council of Europe's European Social Charter and the revised Social Charter.

2.2 Accession to the European Convention on Human Rights

I therefore welcome the fact that the Laeken Declaration has put the question of accession by the EC/EU to the ECHR on the agenda of this Convention. It is very appropriate that this is compared with the question of integration of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights into the Treaties, because these issues go hand in hand. Accession to the ECHR has been repeatedly advocated by the European Commission<sup>1</sup> and the European Parliament<sup>2</sup>. Therefore Laeken has provided the Convention with a unique opportunity to achieve a coherent mechanism for the protection of fundamental rights in the whole of Europe.

2.3 Why is accession so important?

First of all, it is vital if we are to ensure coherence and legal certainty between the legal systems of both the EU and the Council of Europe in the field of fundamental rights. In applying Community law, member states are indeed bound by both Community law and the ECHR. However, this may lead to genuine problems if the Community itself is not also legally bound by the ECHR and if its action is not subject to the same review by the European Court of Human Rights, as is applicable to the action of individual EU member states. Avoiding divergence between the interpretation of fundamental rights in Europe is therefore essential for the legislatures, governments and courts of Union member states, as it is, evidently, for the individual citizen. This can best be achieved by accession.

2.4 Increase legal accountability

In addition, by extending to the EU the external control mechanism of the ECHR to which the member states are already subject, accession would confer upon the action of the EU institutions the same level of legitimacy, credibility and legal accountability now enjoyed by the member states' authorities.

2.5 No subordination between Courts

The Presidents of both the European Court of Human Rights and the Court of Justice of the European Communities, at the opening of the judicial year in Strasbourg on 31 January 2002, expressed support for the idea of accession to the ECHR. They concluded that there was no question of perceived or real “subordination” between the two courts <sup>1</sup>.

2.6 No major obstacles to accession

The Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe has asked governmental experts to undertake a technical examination of the changes to the ECHR required to make EC/EU accession possible. Preliminary results indicate that there are no major obstacles to accession that cannot be overcome by the necessary political will. A full report is expected by the end of June this year.

2.7 A common legal area for the Greater Europe

How fundamental rights in the European Union should best be protected in the future is undoubtedly one of the most important questions that the Convention will have to examine. I trust that the Convention will conclude that accession to the ECHR is essential for the effective protection of fundamental rights in the Union. This will also be a significant step in bringing the Union closer to its citizens by providing them with the same means of redress as the ECHR gives them at national level. However, accession of the EU/EC to the ECHR would be a major step forward in the construction of a common legal area for the Greater Europe.

Developing pan-European responses to major challenges

3.1 All-European challenge

Many treaties concluded within the Council of Europe have contributed to the creation of an area of freedom, security and justice which is a common goal of our institutions. They are part of the European Union's acquis on the basis of which closer cooperation within the Union has been developed. Meeting the challenges to our democratic societies cannot stop at the borders of the European Union. These include:

- fighting against terrorism;
- combating corruption, organised crime and human trafficking;
- preventing drug abuse and drug trafficking;
- responding to violence;
- fighting against racism and xenophobia.

3.2 Multilateral solutions

The best way of taking effective action in these areas is not by a series of bilateral agreements with each of the Union's immediate neighbours, but by the adoption of pan-European multilateral solutions which are coherent with the European Union's own internal measures. The conclusions of the European Council in Tampere rightly foresee cooperation with the Council of Europe in this area. We have already created an effective interface between Council of Europe and European Union activities, in particular through the presence of the European Commission in all intergovernmental structures, including ministerial sessions. An increasing number of Council of Europe conventions and agreements are open to accession by the European Community<sup>1</sup>. We should develop this further.

A forum for EU foreign policy towards its immediate neighbours

4.1 A Europe without dividing lines

This steadily developing common legal area for the 800 million Europeans within the Council of Europe's borders, from Reykjavik to Vladivostok, presents a solid basis for our joint vision of building a Europe without dividing lines and consolidating it through a network of interlocking institutions.

4.2 Extending Article 303 of the EC Treaty

The Convention could give its political support to this joint task by recommending in its review of the present Treaties that the European Union make full use of the structures of the Council of Europe. To this end, it would seem desirable not only to preserve Art. 303 of the EC Treaty, which stipulates that the Community shall establish all appropriate forms of cooperation with the Council of Europe, but also to extend its scope of application to include all matters falling within the competence of the European Union, notably those dealt with under the present second and third pillars.

4.3 Discuss questions of common concern on an equal footing

The Laeken Declaration underlines that the relations between the Union and the other European states which are its immediate neighbours are of particular importance, both for the Union itself and for those states. The European Union, with its common external borders, its internal market and freedom of movement, runs the risk of creating a sense of exclusion among those states which will remain for the time being outside the Union. There is therefore a legitimate common interest in having a meeting place where representatives from the whole of Europe at parliamentary, government, local or regional level can come together to discuss questions of common concern on an equal footing - a Europe without dividing lines<sup>1</sup>. The Council of Europe provides such a framework. The European Union is already an important actor in the Council of Europe. There is nonetheless scope for a much more active participation of the EU institutions in the various bodies of the Council of Europe in order to reinforce the dialogue and cooperation between representatives of the whole of Europe.

4.4 EU accession to the Council of Europe?

I therefore invite the European Commission to step up its participation in the Council of Europe at the level of the Committee of Ministers and its subsidiary bodies. This will be of mutual benefit to both partners. The same applies to committees of governmental experts. This would enable the European Union to pursue further the recent experience of extending rules in Community legislation to the whole of Europe by transposing such provisions into Council of Europe conventions or agreements. The political option of the Union's future membership of the Council of Europe merits closer consideration.

4.5 Develop parliamentary cooperation

The Parliamentary Assembly with its representatives of 44 national parliaments offers a unique framework for promoting the common European project. Existing cooperation with the European Parliament can be developed further. Members of the European Commission could address the Assembly much more frequently than is at present the case.

4.6 Develop CFSP within the Council of Europe

The High Representative/Secretary General of the EU Council could at regular intervals address the Assembly and the Committee of Ministers. This would be one way to promote synergies between the Common Foreign and Security Policy of the EU and the enlarged political dialogue amongst all European democracies. The Council of Europe thus provides a platform on which to develop the European Union's foreign policy with regard to its immediate neighbours.

In conclusion

I am convinced that:

- The instruments and activities of the Council of Europe assist the EU enlargement process
- Together we need a coherent approach to the protection of human rights in Europe
- The Council of Europe provides a forum for the Greater democratic Europe

The Council of Europe is following with the greatest interest the ambitious plans for the future of the Union expressed in the Laeken Declaration and is keen to contribute, at both intergovernmental and parliamentary level, to the discussions in the Convention, as appropriate, during the completion of its important mandate.

I wish the Convention every success in its historic task.

THE EUROPEAN CONVENTION

Brussels, 28 juin 2002

THE SECRETARIAT

Working Group II

Working document 02

Working group II " Incorporation of the Charter/accession to the ECHR"*Subject : Contribution of Elena PACIOTTI - MEP

During the first exchange of views of 25 June 2002 inside the Working Group "Charter" some observations and questions were made to which I deem appropriate to react:

1. The Charter of fundamental rights of the European Union (from now on called "the Charter") is a political document, not a juridical one.

No, the Charter was explicitly drafted as if it should be integrated in the Treaties; the aim was to leave it to the IGC in Nice to decide about whether or not it should be integrated in the Treaties. The fact that at the time no agreement was reached on the integration of the Charter in the Treaties - despite the request of several member States and of the European Parliament - doesn't change the intrinsic characteristics of the document. Indeed it is and remains formulated so as to potentially constitute the first part of a "constitutional" text, similar to the first parts of the constitutions of many Nation-States.

2. The Charter lacks precision in many articles and this could cause judges several problems as to its implementation.

No, it couldn't. In the first parts of many modern constitutions there are articles affirming general principles and others affirming specific rights. This has never prevented national Constitutional Courts from enforcing both. Besides, up to now fundamental rights - apart from those stated in the European Convention for Human Rights now included in the Charter - have been granted by the European Court of Justice on the sole basis of a much more generic mention to "constitutional traditions common to the Member States" in article 6 of the TEU.

3. The Charter includes principles and rights which do not concern the European Union competencies:

a) Why? b) If the Charter is integrated in the Treaties, will this give rise to new competencies of the Union?

a) The Charter was drafted to render the whole of the fundamental rights already into force in the European Union more evident, following the principle of the indivisibility of fundamental rights. It would have been absurd to try and highlight only those rights involving present competencies of the Union and of the Community: firstly because it would have meant redrafting the Charter with every change in the framework of the Union's competencies; secondly because, above all, the meaning of every single article of the Charter must be interpreted in the context of all the others and the scope of a fundamental right is in relation to the need to guarantee other rights (quite evidently, affirming the freedom principle alone is different from affirming the freedom, equality and solidarity principles together).

b) The need to draft an exhaustive list of fundamental rights and principles in force in the EU has nothing to do with the attribution of competencies. The powers of the EU and EC institutions are foreseen in the Treaties and their exercise is limited by the obligation to respect the fundamental rights and principles included in the Charter.

In the framework of their specific competencies, the institutions also have the right to promote the respect of those rights and principles.

4. Is the Charter, with its 54 articles, too long to be part of a simplified "constitutional" Treaty?

No, it isn't. All contemporary constitutions are "long" constitutions because the catalogue of fundamental rights that citizens want to be granted has widened and the complexity of procedures concerning the exercise of public powers in modern States has grown. This is all the more so for such a complex supranational entity like the European Union.

For example, while the Swedish constitution of 1809 has 13 articles, the Italian one of 1948 has 139 articles (54 of which constituting its first part), the German one of 1949 has 146 articles, the Portuguese one of 1976 has 299 articles and the Polish one of 1997 has 243 articles (57 of which constituting the Chapter "Freedom, rights and duties of man and citizen").

Working group II "Incorporation of the Charter/ accession to the ECHR"

From: António Vitorino, President

To: Working Group II

Subject : The relationship between the Charter and the Union's competencies

1. It has been observed that some articles set out in the Charter concern areas in which the Community or the Union have little or no competence to act. This point has notably been made for the right to strike or to education, freedom of religion, the prohibition of the death penalty and of torture, the articles of the Charter on criminal law, as well as the articles on social security and social assistance and on access to healthcare<sup>1</sup>. The concern has been expressed that integration of the Charter into the Treaties could lead to an extension of Community / Union competencies in such areas, despite the provision in Article 51 § 2 of the Charter that "this Charter does not establish any new power or task for the Community or the Union, or modify powers and tasks defined by the Treaties".
2. This issue was extensively discussed in the preceding Convention which established the Charter. It might be worthwhile to recall some considerations which had helped to build consensus, within that Convention, on inclusion of the above-mentioned articles in the text of the Charter.

3. The preceding Convention was guided by the idea that a distinction should be made between the extent of the Union's legislative competencies, on the one hand, and respect by the Union of all fundamental rights wherever it acts, on the other hand. Indeed, several examples drawn from the institutions' practice appear to illustrate that the Union's action may well have important impacts even on such fundamental rights that concern areas where the Union would have no or little competence to legislate:
- Council Regulation No 2679/98 on the functioning of the internal market in relation to the free movement of goods among the Member States, in which it was deemed necessary to include an article ensuring that the regulation is without prejudice to respect notably for the right to strike <sup>1</sup>;
  - the exclusion, in agreements with third countries on mutual legal assistance in criminal matters, of extradition of persons facing a serious risk of being subjected to the death penalty;
  - the current draft Directive on minimum standards for the reception of asylum seekers in the Member States, on which the Council has reached political agreement, and which includes provisions guaranteeing asylum seekers access to school education and to health care;
  - convocation of a staff competition by a Community institution on a Jewish holiday which may impinge on freedom of religion of the participants; it was in this situation that the European Court of Justice recognised freedom of religion as part of the fundamental rights of Community law <sup>2</sup>.
  - Community agriculture legislation which could have impacts on freedom of religion by limiting ritual slaughtering as practised by certain religions.

<sup>1</sup> See Article 2: "This Regulation may not be interpreted as affecting in any way the exercise of fundamental rights as recognised in Member States, including the right or freedom to strike. These rights may also include the right or freedom to take other actions covered by the specific industrial relations systems in Member States." See also recital N° 4: "Whereas such measures [i.e. measures which the Member States are obliged to take under the regulation with a view to facilitating the free movement of goods in their territory] must not affect the exercise of fundamental rights, including the right or freedom to strike."

4. This distinction is already reflected in the opinion 2/94 of the Court of Justice, points 27 - 35, where the Court found no general power of the Community to enact rules on fundamental rights<sup>1</sup> but at the same time recalled that respect for fundamental rights, as general principles of Community law, is a condition of the lawfulness of Community acts. Furthermore, it appears that in Regulation 2679/98, the Council has recognised explicitly the point that its acts, as well as Member States' action implementing them, must respect even such fundamental rights as the right to strike on which it would not have competence to legislate.
5. It is in the light of this distinction that the preceding Convention opted for a complete catalogue of all fundamental rights which the Union is to respect, including the above-mentioned articles, while at the same time stipulating in Article 51 § 2 that the Charter does not establish new Community / Union powers, or modify the existing ones.
6. In addition, some more recent extensions of the Union's competencies should be noted, notably in the field of criminal law, as created by the Treaty on the European Union ("3rd pillar"), which informed inclusion in the Charter of the fundamental safeguards set out in its Articles 48 through 50.<sup>2</sup>
7. It has however been argued that Article 51 § 1, second sentence, of the Charter, stipulating that the institutions of the Union not only respect the rights and observe the principles of the Charter, but also "promote the application thereof", could be interpreted as creating new competencies insofar as the above-mentioned Charter articles are concerned, and that this wording could be regarded as contradicting Article 51 § 2 of the Charter. However, in full the provision at issue reads: "They [i.e. the institutions and bodies of the Union and Member States when implementing Union law] shall respect the rights, observe the principles and promote the application thereof in accordance with their respective powers." (emphasis added). It appears that this wording can be read as clarifying that obligations to promote the application of Charter rights and principles arise only within the limits of the existing division of competencies between the Union and the Member States, thus confirming the principle of Article 51 § 2 of the Charter, and that the extent to which competencies for such "promotion" exist may vary, depending on the different Charter articles and on whether Union institutions or Member States authorities (implementing Union law) are concerned.

<sup>1</sup> It should be noted that while such general power is lacking, the Community does in some areas adopt specific measures relating to fundamental rights, either on the basis of particular Articles of the Treaty (see, for example Articles 13 and 141 of the EC Treaty) or "annexed" to the exercise of the competences attributed to it, see on this point doc. CONV 116/02, page 22, footnote 1.

<sup>2</sup> In particular, as noted in the Praesidium's Explanations to Article 50 of the Charter, the right not to be tried or punished twice is already enshrined in Articles 54 to 58 of the Schengen Convention, as well as in Article 7 of the Convention of the Communities's Financial Interests and in Article 10 of the Convention on the fight against corruption (conventions established by the Council in accordance with the EU Treaty).

In the light of the above elements, can it be assumed that the Charter, if integrated into the Treaties, would not create new powers of the Community / the Union, or modify its existing powers, as it states in its Article 51 § 2?

If the body of the articles of the Charter were to be inserted into the EU Treaty itself or in a new basic Treaty (option f), would then a possible drafting adjustment of Article 51(2) of the Charter, clarifying that the Charter articles do not alter the powers and tasks as defined by the other provisions of the Treaties, be necessary or useful?<sup>1</sup>

Working document 04

Working group II "Incorporation of the Charter / accession to the ECHR"

Working document by Baroness Scotland of Asthal

Subject: The “missing” horizontal article in the Charter of Rights

1. Introduction

At the Working Group’s first meeting, I made reference to Charter articles based neither on the ECHR nor on the EC Treaty. I attach a table showing examples of these. My particular concern is that there appears to be no horizontal article governing these articles.

2. Existing horizontal articles

Of course, Charter articles corresponding to the ECHR are clarified by Article 52(3); and Charter articles based on the Treaties are clarified by Article 52(2). These so-called “horizontal” articles are of great importance - and their significance would be even greater were the Charter to be incorporated into the Treaties. But they do not help us with the other Charter provisions. These other provisions have no clarification other than the Praesidium Commentary (which is not part of the Charter) and perhaps Article 51(2), which confirms that the Charter is not intended to establish any new power or task for the Community or Union<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> For some Articles, this qualification is reinforced by Treaty provisions, which forbid the EC to legislate in certain areas (e.g. Education and vocational training [TEC Art 149(4) and c.f. Charter Art 14]; or Employment [TEC Art 129 and c.f. Charter Arts 15, 23, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33]); and reserve other areas to the Member States (e.g.

3. Implications

I believe that this absence of clarification (for articles not based on the ECHR or Treaties) would be a serious problem were the Charter to be given greater legal status than it currently enjoys. The third column of the attached table identifies some practical implications which, I believe, the Group should have in mind when it considers this legal problem. Citizens and Member State Governments would not be clear precisely which rights and responsibilities are entailed by the Charter. There would be some major questions:

- Definition: what is the agreed basis for the article concerned? Is it a principle? Or a fundamental right or freedom, perhaps with some irreducible minimum “essence” such as is found with the rights in the ECHR?
- Scope: what is the extent and enforceability of the article concerned?
- Limitation: what are the circumstances in which the right may be curtailed and balanced, if any?

If the Charter were to be incorporated in its current form, the task of answering these questions would fall to the ECJ. But the questions involve important political considerations. Would it be right to delegate these from democratically elected politicians?

4. Common constitutional traditions?

It is relevant to note that some of the Articles in the attachment may be part of the constitutional traditions common to the Member States (this is indicated in the Charter Preamble paragraph 5). But is that true in every case:

- Charter Article 3: according to the Commentary, this is based on the Council of Europe Convention on Biomedicine. But the Convention appears not to have been ratified by all the Member States.
- Charter Article 10(2): according to the Commentary, this is based on the common constitutional traditions. But is this right currently guaranteed by all the Member States?
- Charter Article 14: according to the Commentary, this is based on the common constitutional traditions and on Article 2 of the First Protocol to the ECHR. Have all Member States legal provision for parental “pedagogical convictions”? And Germany, Ireland, the Netherlands and the UK have reservations against Article 2 of the First Protocol to the ECHR.
- Charter Article 24: according to the Commentary, this is based on the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. All Member States have accepted this Convention but Austria, Denmark, France, the Netherlands and the Health services [TEC Art 152(5) and c.f. Charter Art 1, 3, 25, 31, 34, 35]; or Public order and public security [TEC Art 64(1) and c.f. Charter Art 6, 10, 47]). See also CONV 47/02 (Brussels, 15 May 2002).

UK have entered reservations. The Charter has no provision to respect those reservations.

- All the Charter articles entirely or partly based on the European Social Charter or the Revised European Social Charter (Articles 14, 15, 23 and from 25 to 35) which are not accepted by all the Member States.

5. Recommendations

I believe the Working Group should consider the need for a supplementary horizontal article or alternatively an appropriate provision in any proposed article of incorporation.

In Canada, “integrity” has been used to campaign against infant male circumcision. 3(2) has no qualifications at all and may outlaw Member State arrangements for e.g. genetic and pre-natal testing.3(2) addresses matters reserved to the Member States (organisation and supply of medical care) – see final section below |
| Article 9Right to marry and right to found a family                             | The Commentary states that this is based on ECHR Article 12, but the scope is wider, embracing "same-sex" marriages – which a court might find is part of the essence of the right, which cannot therefore be curtailed by the laws and practices of Member States.. Though Charter Article 52 may apply, 52(3) does not "prevent Union law providing more extensive protection". | Despite the reference to national laws, Article 9 may lead to new national obligations e.g. to grant EC free movement rights to partners in same sex and transsexual marriages, including third country nationals, as well as an extension of asylum rights and family reunification rules.It might also have implications regarding adoption by homosexual couples ("right to found a family") which may cause problems for some MSs.                                                                                              |
| Article 10Freedom of thought, conscience and religion (conscientious objection) | The Commentary states that paragraph 2 (conscientious objection) corresponds to national constitutional traditions.Not clear which if any horizontal Article governs the interpretation of this Charter Article and its limitations.                                                                                                                                         | On its face, 10(2) defers to national legislation, but the Court could find an irreducible minimum right, drawing upon ECtHR jurisprudence on fundamental rights and the first sentence of Charter Article 52(1). This would reduce the scope for national limitations and may lead to new States obligations.                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| Article 13Freedom of the arts and sciences                                      | The Commentary states that this Article is "deduced" from the right to freedom of thought and expression. Not clear which if any horizontal Article governs the interpretation of this Charter Article and its limitations.                                                                                                                                                       | Article 13 claims to be deduced from the principles in ECHR Article 10, but the wording, and its separation from Charter Article 10, seems apt to create a new right and new positive duties. State controls on some forms of scientific research may not survive challenge under this Article. “Free of constraint” is as odd for the arts as for scientific research – some expression needs to be constrained in the public interest – obscenity laws?                                                                                |

The Commentary states that this is a "principle" which was necessary to add to this provision. Article 14(2) is not based on the Treaties or ECHR. Unclear which if any horizontal Article governs the interpretation of this Charter Article and its limitations. | Article 14 goes beyond the ECHR provisions regarding access to vocational and continuing training, parents pedagogical convictions and free compulsory education.On its face, 14(3) defers to national legislation, but it may be argued that there is an irreducible minimum right, drawing upon ECtHR jurisprudence on fundamental rights and the first sentence of Charter Article 52(1) (in which case the scope for national limitations may be limited). New positive duties (e.g. an access to vocational training) are implied in an area where the EU is precluded from legislation.Germany, Ireland, the Netherlands and the UK have entered reservations against Article 2 of First Protocol to the ECHR. It is unclear that these would be respected. |
| Article 19Protection in the event of removal, expulsion or extradition                | The Commentary states that paragraph 1 is based on Article 4 of the Fourth Protocol to the ECHR (which not all Member States have accepted) and on ECHR Article 3 (same scope).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | The national positions of Member States which have chosen not to accept the Fourth Protocol to the ECHR on which 19(1) is based (Greece, Spain, UK) is not respected.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

Working group II "Incorporation of the Charter/accession to the ECHR"

Working document by Mr. Vytenis Povilas Andriukaitis

Subject : Legal status of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union

Taking into account that the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (hereinafter "Charter") was adopted with a view to strengthening the protection of fundamental rights in the European Union, systematising all fundamental rights stipulated in different legal acts of the European Communities and international instruments and setting them out in a single text, making these rights more visible and explicit to the EU citizens, and ensuring the confidence of the European people in the process of further European integration as well as considering that the declarative nature of the Charter creates obstacles for the effective implementation of the rights foreseen in it, a conclusion may be drawn that the Charter should have a binding effect. This effect can be granted by incorporating the Charter into the Treaty on the European Union or the future EU Constitution.

The modality of the incorporation of the Charter into the Treaty (Constitution) should be determined on the basis of the requirements of legal certainty and clarity. As the Charter might be seen as a compromise in itself, the most appropriate way of its incorporation would be by introducing the least possible modifications in the contents of the Charter and the EU/EC legal system.

Modalities and consequences of the incorporation of the Charter into the Treaty on the EU (EU Constitution):

1. The incorporation of the Charter into the Treaty on the European Union or a new basic treaty

This alternative is supported by the Commission of the European Union, the European Parliament and a number of member states.

The preamble of the Charter, with minor changes, could be incorporated into the preamble of the Treaty on the European Union; the text of the Charter, excluding the general provisions, could be added as a separate chapter of the Treaty. Within the Treaty, the provisions of the Charter would have the status of the primary EU legislation (the legal status of the Charter would be similar to that of the EC/EU Treaties). Direct applicability of the provisions of the Charter could be guided by the general terms of the direct applicability of the EC law. A point should be made that the wording of some of the provisions of the Charter does not meet the terms of direct applicability set by the European Court of Justice. Therefore, problems could be avoided by applying the community method for the regulation of fundamental rights.

Some of the provisions in the Charter replicate the provisions of the Treaty establishing the European Communities, therefore, while integrating the Charter into the Treaty, the problem of the replication of rights should be addressed. This is primarily relevant to the rights of the citizens' of the European Union, principle of non-discrimination, and equal opportunities between men and women. Thus, the citizens' rights could be either deleted from the EC Treaty or only the provisions specifying these rights could be retained which establish additional obligations to institutions, certain procedures of their discharge, etc. Other rights envisaged in the Treaty could be modified. If some of the rights foreseen in the Charter were further regulated under the same or other Treaties, the wording "it shall be exercised within the limits and under conditions set in the treaties" should be added to every right stipulated in the Charter.

Major problems would be created by the need to change the general provisions of the Charter. If these provisions were left out, the meaning and effectiveness of the Charter as a whole could be jeopardised. Therefore, it would be expedient to consider the necessity of retaining (or modifying) each of the general provisions of the Charter in the new Treaty. Already now, it is possible to foresee that Article 51(1) would lose its sense if the Charter was included into the Treaty, while the necessity of Article 51(2) of the Charter will have to be assessed after the final solution of the issues of the status and competencies of the EC and EU. Article 52(2) and the provisions concerning the relationship between the Charter and the European Convention on Human Rights listed in Article 52(3) should be specified. There is some uncertainty about Article 53 of the Charter dealing with the relationship between the Charter and the national constitutions of the member states regarding its compliance with the principle of the supremacy of the EC law. The problem could be solved by indicating (like in the case of the definition of the EU citizenship) that the Charter shall not replace the human rights stipulated in national constitutions but rather supplement them. This could be laid down in Article 6 of the EU Treaty or in an article of the Constitution.

2. Incorporation of the Charter in the form of a separate Protocol annexed to the Treaty

In this case, incorporation of the Charter would have the same legal value and consequences as in the first case as under both international and EU law protocols are construed as an integral part of a Treaty. Such an option would be in line with the wishes of some EU member states to see the Charter as a separate document and would provide a solution if no EU Constitution is adopted. This option would be simpler in technical terms in comparison with the first option and would require fewer amendments to the Charter and the Treaties. In this case, however, the general provisions of the Charter would have to be modified. A reference to the Charter could be made in Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty.

3. Reference to the Charter in Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty

This possibility was foreseen already before the Nice conference. The reference could be direct, in a separate additional part of the article, or indirect – by expanding Article 6(2) and making a reference to the Charter as to yet another source on which the European Court of Justice draws in protecting human rights as the general principles of the EC law. Although this option would be technically simpler than the first ones, a problem would arise with the reference to ECHR made in Article 6(2) because the greater part of the rights stipulated in the Charter are based on the Convention. An indirect reference to the Charter without changing its status would merely mean a formal statement of recognition of the rights stipulated in the Charter as general principles. It is doubtful whether such a reference would be expedient.

The control mechanism over the protection of the rights enshrined in the Charter.

In connection with incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties, the question arises whether paragraph 4 of Article 230 of the EC Treaty should be amended to extend the conditions of admissibility for direct action by individuals in the European Court of Justice or whether a new form of legal action should be introduced for the purposes of protection of fundamental rights. An introduction of a new form of legal action would not be expedient because violations of fundamental rights are usually related to a specific form of already existing actions. If the European Court of Justice is given the competence to apply and interpret the provisions of the Charter, it would become the last instance in cases related to the violation of rights stipulated in the ECHR and the Charter. Such a situation could lead to a conflicting case-law of the European Court of Human Rights and the European Court of Justice; besides, the Charter provisions with regard to actions by member states would not have equal legal value and consequences. It should also be noted that all the rulings by the European Court of Justice are passed unanimously. Such a method of handing down decisions could create obstacles for a dynamic interpretation of human rights provisions. As the European Court of Justice itself falls within the Charter's sphere of control, a question arises whether an external control mechanism should be introduced. That is why it may be worthwhile to discuss an option of establishing a judicial or legal institution with a competence to ensure the compliance with the standards enshrined in the Charter. In view of the problems mentioned above and of the possible extension of the competencies of the European Court of Justice in the field of justice and home affairs, some of the Lithuanian experts believe that it would be expedient to establish a new permanent judicial institution to ensure the implementation of the rights under the Charter. Initially, a Fundamental Rights Commission could be established which would also be able to supervise the compliance with the provisions of the Charter by EU institutions.

After an analysis of the modalities and consequences of incorporation of the Charter into the Treaty, it must be emphasised that this issue is closely linked with other issues being discussed at the Convention, such as division of competencies, accession by the Community/Union to the ECHR, simplification of the Treaties. It is therefore necessary to take into account the results of work of other working groups and their proposals.

Working group II -"Incorporation of the Charter/accession to the ECHR"*Working document by Elena Paciotti*Subject:       Answers to questions in chapter II of doc. CONV 116/02

Referring to the Secretariat's discussion paper CONV 116/02 of 18 June 2002 concerning "Modalities and consequences of incorporation into the Treaties of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and accession of the Community/Union to the ECHR", I will try to answer the questions raised in chapter II:

1. Possible techniques for incorporation of the Charter

The problem of the incorporation of the Charter of fundamental rights of the European Union in a Treaty having the contents and the value of a European constitution can be easily solved looking at the only distinguished precedent of a constitution written shortly after the declaration of fundamental rights. I am referring to the French Constitution of 1791 that incorporated the Declaration of human rights of 1789 simply by inserting it before the text of the other constitutional norms.

I enclose this document for better information.

As highlighted in the meeting of 25 June, every modern constitution includes a catalogue of fundamental rights and principles: in the European Union this catalogue was recently drafted and adopted by an ad hoc Convention and subsequently signed and proclaimed by the three European institutions. It is difficult to imagine a European "constitution" without the Charter of fundamental rights constituting its first part (see indent f of point 1 of the Secretariat's discussion paper). This solution would further allow the Charter to be amended or updated with the same modalities as those for "constitutional" revision.

2. The question of current Article 6(2) of the EU Treaty

If the Charter is incorporated into the "constitutional" Treaty, it would neither be necessary or useful to maintain current art. 6.2 of the TEU mentioning common constitutional traditions of Member states and the European Convention for Human Rights.

It would not be necessary because the ECHR is already included in the Charter and reference is made in its preamble to the common constitutional traditions of Member states. Another reason is that in European constitutional systems the catalogue of fundamental rights is not exhaustive and does not avoid adjustment and evolution of jurisprudence, without any need to mention external sources. It would not be useful because the mention of plurality of juridical sources would seem incomprehensible and could create uncertainty and confusion.

3. The question of the preamble to the Charter

The incorporation of the Charter includes its preamble (that played a relevant role in the acceptance of the final compromise leading to the adoption of the Charter) as in the above-mentioned precedent of the French Constitution of 1791.

Instead, a part of the Treaties' preamble might be redrafted so to be integrated into the "constitutional" Treaty, but probably this will not be necessary because all the essential references to the Union's objectives and principles are already included in the preamble to the Charter .

4. The question of "replication" in the Charter

The rights included in the Charter and already stated in the ECT will not have to be replicated through articles of the "constitutional" treaty; they can nonetheless be specified and clarified in the text in order to group systematically all the non "constitutional" provisions present in the treaties currently in force.

5. Examination of certain technical adjustments in the provisions of the Charter

The Charter as a whole must not be modified in order to become the first part of a European constitution; nevertheless some limited technical adjustments will be useful concerning the final clauses such as those contained in articles 51.2 and 52.2.

6. Treaty provisions concerning the Court of Justice

a) In the event of the incorporation of the Charter in the "constitutional" Treaty, the provision concerning the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice (current article 46 TEU) will have to be changed extending its scope to the Charter without limiting it to the activity of the institutions. In fact, article 51.1 of the Charter, in compliance with the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice, already states that it applies to the institutions and bodies of the Union and to Member States when implementing the Union's law.

b) Competencies of the Court on subjects related to Justice and Home affairs

The incorporation of the Charter in the "constitutional" Treaty (i.e. the need to guarantee fundamental rights) implies that some of the current limitations to the competencies of the Court of Justice are eliminated, such as those foreseen by current articles 35.5 EUT and 68.2 and 3 ECT.

c) The question of the liberalisation of conditions for direct referral to the Court

To establish a balance between the need to protect fundamental rights of citizens and the need for efficiency of the Court of Justice, the following might be sufficient:

- the incorporation of the Charter in the "constitutional" Treaty allowing for the exercise of the control of legitimacy, even from the point of view of the respect of all the fundamental rights included in the Charter.
- The redrafting of current article 230.4 ECT following the extensive interpretation adopted by the Court of First Instance in the case Jégo-Quéré. In this case the Court stated that everyone can bring referral against decisions affecting him/her and against decisions that, while appearing as regulations or decisions affecting other persons, de facto concern him/her directly and individually or touch at his/her juridical position by restricting his/her right or imposing additional obligations.

ANNEX*Texte de la Constitution française de 1791 ( dont la Déclaration des droits de l'homme de 1789 constitue le préambule)

Les représentants du peuple français, constitués en Assemblée nationale, considérant que l'ignorance, l'oubli ou le mépris des droits de l'homme sont les seules causes des malheurs publics et de la corruption des gouvernements, ont résolu d'exposer, dans une déclaration solennelle, les droits naturels, inaliénables et sacrés de l'homme, afin que cette déclaration, constamment présente à tous les membres du corps social, leur rappelle sans cesse leurs droits et leurs devoirs ; afin que les actes du pouvoir législatif et ceux du pouvoir exécutif, pouvant être à chaque instant comparés avec le but de toute institution politique, en soient plus respectés ; afin que les réclamations des citoyens, fondées désormais sur des principes simples et incontestables, tournent toujours au maintien de la Constitution et au bonheur de tous.

En conséquence, l'Assemblée nationale reconnaît et déclare, en présence et sous les auspices de l'Être Suprême, les droits suivants de l'homme et du citoyen.

Article premier. - Les hommes naissent et demeurent libres et égaux en droits. Les distinctions sociales ne peuvent être fondées que sur l'utilité commune.

Article 2. - Le but de toute association politique est la conservation des droits naturels et imprescriptibles de l'homme. Ces droits sont la liberté, la propriété, la sûreté et la résistance à l'oppression.

Article 3. - Le principe de toute souveraineté réside essentiellement dans la Nation. Nul corps, nul individu ne peut exercer d'autorité qui n'en émane expressément.

Article 4. - La liberté consiste à pouvoir faire tout ce qui ne nuit pas à autrui : ainsi, l'exercice des droits naturels de chaque homme n'a de bornes que celles qui assurent aux autres membres de la société la jouissance de ces mêmes droits. Ces bornes ne peuvent être déterminées que par la loi.

Article 5. - La loi n'a le droit de défendre que les actions nuisibles à la société. Tout ce qui n'est pas défendu par la loi ne peut être empêché, et nul ne peut être contraint à faire ce qu'elle n'ordonne pas.

Article 6. - La loi est l'expression de la volonté générale. Tous les citoyens ont droit de concourir personnellement ou par leurs représentants à sa formation. Elle doit être la même pour tous, soit qu'elle protège, soit qu'elle punisse. Tous les citoyens, étant égaux à ses yeux, sont également admissibles à toutes dignités, places et emplois publics, selon leur capacité et sans autre distinction que celle de leurs vertus et de leurs talents.

Article 7. - Nul homme ne peut être accusé, arrêté ou détenu que dans les cas déterminés par la loi et selon les formes qu'elle a prescrites. Ceux qui sollicitent, expédient, exécutent ou font exécuter des ordres arbitraires doivent être punis ; mais tout citoyen appelé ou saisi en vertu de la loi doit obéir à l'instant ; il se rend coupable par la résistance.

Article 8. - La loi ne doit établir que des peines strictement et évidemment nécessaires, et nul ne peut être puni qu'en vertu d'une loi établie et promulguée antérieurement au délit, et légalement appliquée.

Article 9. - Tout homme étant présumé innocent jusqu'à ce qu'il ait été déclaré coupable, s'il est jugé indispensable de l'arrêter, toute rigueur qui ne serait pas nécessaire pour s'assurer de sa personne doit être sévèrement réprimée par la loi.

Article 10. - Nul ne doit être inquiété pour ses opinions, même religieuses, pourvu que leur manifestation ne trouble pas l'ordre public établi par la loi.

Article 11. - La libre communication des pensées et des opinions est un des droits les plus précieux de l'homme ; tout citoyen peut donc parler, écrire, imprimer librement, sauf à répondre de l'abus de cette liberté dans les cas déterminés par la loi.

Article 12. - La garantie des droits de l'homme et du citoyen nécessite une force publique ; cette force est donc instituée pour l'avantage de tous, et non pour l'utilité particulière de ceux à qui elle est confiée.

Article 13. - Pour l'entretien de la force publique, et pour les dépenses d'administration, une contribution commune est indispensable ; elle doit être également répartie entre les citoyens, en raison de leurs facultés.

Article 14. - Les citoyens ont le droit de constater, par eux-mêmes ou par leurs représentants, la nécessité de la contribution publique, de la consentir librement, d'en suivre l'emploi, et d'en déterminer la quotité, l'assiette, le recouvrement et la durée.

Article 15. - La société a le droit de demander compte à tout agent public de son administration.

Article 16. - Toute société dans laquelle la garantie des droits n'est pas assurée ni la séparation des pouvoirs déterminée, n'a point de Constitution.

Article 17. - La propriété étant un droit inviolable et sacré, nul ne peut en être privé, si ce n'est lorsque la nécessité publique, légalement constatée, l'exige évidemment, et sous la condition d'une juste et préalable indemnité.

L'Assemblée nationale voulant établir la Constitution française sur les principes qu'elle vient de reconnaître et de déclarer, abolit irrévocablement les institutions qui blessaient la liberté et l'égalité des droits.

- Il n'y a plus ni noblesse, ni pairie, ni distinctions héréditaires, ni distinctions d'ordres, ni régime féodal, ni justices patrimoniales, ni aucun des titres, dénominations et prérogatives qui en dériveraient, ni aucun ordre de chevalerie, ni aucune des corporations ou décorations, pour lesquelles on exigeait des preuves de noblesse, ou qui supposaient des distinctions de naissance, ni aucune autre supériorité, que celle des fonctionnaires publics dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions.

- Il n'y a plus ni vénalité, ni hérédité d'aucun office public.

- Il n'y a plus, pour aucune partie de la Nation, ni pour aucun individu, aucun privilège, ni exception au droit commun de tous les Français.

- Il n'y a plus ni jurandes, ni corporations de professions, arts et métiers.

- La loi ne reconnaît plus ni voeux religieux, ni aucun autre engagement qui serait contraire aux droits naturels ou à la Constitution.

TITRE PREMIER

La Constitution garantit, comme droits naturels et civils :

1° Que tous les citoyens sont admissibles aux places et emplois, sans autre distinction que celle des vertus et des talents ;

2° Que toutes les contributions seront réparties entre tous les citoyens également en proportion de leurs facultés ;

3° Que les mêmes délits seront punis des mêmes peines, sans aucune distinction des personnes.

La Constitution garantit pareillement, comme droits naturels et civils :

- La liberté à tout homme d'aller, de rester, de partir, sans pouvoir être arrêté, ni détenu, que selon les formes déterminées par la Constitution ;

- La liberté d'adresser aux autorités constituées des pétitions signées individuellement.

Le Pouvoir législatif ne pourra faire aucunes lois qui portent atteinte et mettent obstacle à l'exercice des droits naturels et civils consignés dans le présent titre, et garantis par la Constitution ; mais comme la liberté ne consiste qu'à pouvoir faire tout ce qui ne nuit ni aux droits d'autrui, ni à la sûreté publique, la loi peut établir des peines contre les actes qui, attaquant ou la sûreté publique ou les droits d'autrui, seraient nuisibles à la société.

La Constitution garantit l'inviolabilité des propriétés ou la juste et préalable indemnité de celles dont la nécessité publique, légalement constatée, exigerait le sacrifice. - Les biens destinés aux dépenses du culte et à tous services d'utilité publique, appartiennent à la Nation, et sont dans tous les temps à sa disposition.

La Constitution garantit les aliénations qui ont été ou qui seront faites suivant les formes établies par la loi.

Les citoyens ont le droit d'élire ou choisir les ministres de leurs cultes.

Il sera créé et organisé un établissement général de Secours publics, pour élever les enfants abandonnés, soulager les pauvres infirmes, et fournir du travail aux pauvres valides qui n'auraient pu s'en procurer.

Il sera créé et organisé une Instruction publique commune à tous les citoyens, gratuite à l'égard des parties d'enseignement indispensables pour tous les hommes et dont les établissements seront distribués graduellement, dans un rapport combiné avec la division du royaume. - Il sera établi des fêtes nationales pour conserver le souvenir de la Révolution française, entretenir la fraternité entre les citoyens, et les attacher à la Constitution, à la Patrie et aux lois.

ART. 6. - Les électeurs nommeront en chaque district, au scrutin individuel, et à la pluralité absolue des suffrages, un citoyen éligible et domicilié dans le district, auquel ils donneront, par le procès-verbal de l'élection, un mandat spécial borné à la seule fonction d'élire le citoyen qu'il jugera en son âme et conscience le plus digne d'être régent du royaume.

ART 7. - Les citoyens mandataires nommés dans les districts, seront tenus de se rassembler dans la ville où le Corps législatif tiendra sa séance, le quarantième jour, au plus tard, à partir de celui de l'avènement du roi mineur au trône ; et ils y formeront l'assemblée électorale, qui procédera à la nomination du régent.

ART. 13. - Tant que le régent n'est pas entré en exercice de ses fonctions, la sanction des lois demeure suspendue ; les ministres continuent de faire, sous leur responsabilité, tous les actes du Pouvoir exécutif.

ART. 14. - Aussitôt que le régent aura prêté le serment, le Corps législatif déterminera son traitement, lequel ne pourra être changé pendant la durée de la régence.

ART. 15. - Si, à raison de la minorité d'âge du parent appelé à la régence, elle a été dévolue à un parent plus éloigné, ou déférée par élection, le régent qui sera entré en exercice continuera ses fonctions jusqu'à la majorité du roi.

TITRE VII

De la révision des décrets constitutionnels

ARTICLE PREMIER. - L'Assemblée nationale constituante déclare que la Nation a le droit imprescriptible de changer sa Constitution ; et néanmoins, considérant qu'il est plus conforme à l'intérêt national d'user seulement, par les moyens pris dans la Constitution même, du droit d'en réformer les articles dont l'expérience aurait fait sentir les inconvénients, décrète qu'il y sera procédé par une Assemblée de révision en la forme suivante :

ART. 2. - Lorsque trois législatures consécutives auront émis un vœu uniforme pour le changement de quelque article constitutionnel, il y aura lieu à la révision demandée.

ART. 3. - La prochaine législature et la suivante ne pourront proposer la réforme d'aucun article constitutionnel.

ART. 4. - Des trois législatures qui pourront par la suite proposer quelques changements, les deux premières ne s'occuperont de cet objet que dans les deux derniers mois de leur dernière session, et la troisième à la fin de sa première session annuelle, ou au commencement de la seconde. — Leurs délibérations sur cette matière seront soumises aux mêmes formes que les actes législatifs ; mais les décrets par lesquels elles auront émis leur vœu ne seront pas sujets à la sanction du roi.

ART. 5. - La quatrième législature, augmentée de deux cent quarante-neuf membres élus en chaque département, par doublement du nombre ordinaire qu'il fournit pour sa population, formera l'Assemblée de révision. — Ces deux cent quarante-neuf membres seront élus après que la nomination des représentants au Corps législatif aura été terminée, et il en sera fait un procès-verbal séparé. — L'Assemblée de révision ne sera composée que d'une chambre.

ART. 6. - Les membres de la troisième législature qui aura demandé le changement, ne pourront être élus à l'Assemblée de révision.

ART. 7. - Les membres de l'Assemblée de révision, après avoir prononcé tous ensemble le serment de vivre libres ou mourir, prêteront individuellement celui de se borner à statuer sur les objets qui leur auront été soumis par le vœu uniforme des trois législatures précédentes ; de maintenir, au surplus, de tout leur pouvoir la Constitution du royaume, décrétée par l'Assemblée nationale constituante, aux années 1789, 1790 et 1791, et d'être en tout fidèles à la Nation, à la loi et au roi.

ART. 8. - L'Assemblée de révision sera tenue de s'occuper ensuite, et sans délai, des objets qui auront été soumis à son examen : aussitôt que son travail sera terminé, les deux cent quarante-neuf membres nommés en augmentation, se retireront sans pouvoir prendre part, en aucun cas, aux actes législatifs. Les colonies et possessions françaises dans l'Asie, l'Afrique et l'Amérique, quoiqu'elles fassent partie de l'Empire français, ne sont pas comprises dans la présente Constitution.

Aucun des pouvoirs institués par la Constitution n'a le droit de la changer dans son ensemble ni dans ses parties, sauf les réformes qui pourront y être faites par la voie de la révision, conformément aux dispositions du titre VII ci-dessus.

L'Assemblée nationale constituante en remet le dépôt à la fidélité du Corps législatif, du roi et des juges, à la vigilance des pères de famille, aux épouses et aux mères, à l'affection des jeunes citoyens, au courage de tous les Français.

Les décrets rendus par l'Assemblée nationale constituante, qui ne sont pas compris dans l'Acte de Constitution, seront exécutés comme lois ; et les lois antérieures auxquelles elle n'a pas dérogé, seront également observées, tant que les uns ou les autres n'auront pas été révoqués ou modifiés par le Pouvoir législatif.

L'Assemblée nationale, ayant entendu la lecture de l'Acte constitutionnel ci-dessus, et après l'avoir approuvé, déclare que la Constitution est terminée, et qu'elle ne peut y rien changer. — Il sera nommé à l'instant une députation de soixante membres pour offrir, dans le jour, l'Acte constitutionnel au roi.

Working group II " Incorporation of the Charter/accession to the ECHR"

Working document by Vytenis Andriukaitis

Subject: ANSWERS TO SOME OF THE QUESTIONS RAISED DURING THE FIRST MEETING OF THE WORKING GROUP

With reference to the discussion during the first meeting of the Working Group on the EU Charter on Fundamental Rights devoted to the modalities and possible consequences of incorporation of the Charter into the EU Treaty (Constitution), I would like to suggest answers to some of the questions raised in the course of the meeting, i.e.

1. What would be the consequences of

- a) "attaching" the Charter to the Treaties in the form of a "Solemn Declaration";
- b) making a direct reference to the Charter in the EU Treaty or a new basic Treaty;
- c) the Charter becoming a new Protocol annexed to the Treaties or to a new basic Treaty;
- d) inserting the full body of the Charter into a title or chapter of the EU Treaty or into a new basic Treaty, of which it would for example form the first title or chapter?

2. What would be the relationship of the Charter vis-à-vis the ECHR should options a), b) or c), d) be chosen?

3. What would the competencies of the Court of Justice be under one or another option?

A. “Attaching” the Charter to the Treaty in the form of a “Solemn Declaration” would not change the Charter’s status (it would further remain declarative in character). The difference from the present situation would be negligible. It would only acquire a greater political value. The institutions would have to further comply with the provisions of the Charter in the law-making and implementation process. The European Court of Justice would be able to make references to rights enshrined in the Charter as to general principles of Community law. Some believe, however, that the Charter’s declarative status would produce an opposite effect: it would symbolise Europe’s inability and refusal to take the rights seriously. It could be discussed whether retention of the declarative status is possible because this would go counter to the position of the Institutions that initiated and drafted the Charter and of some of the member states. It would also be hard to explain the reluctance to recognise the legal status of a document which merely integrates the rights already established in Community and international legal acts to which all the members states are parties.

B. Direct Reference to the Charter in Article 6 of the EU Treaty. This possibility had already been foreseen before the Nice conference. The consequences would depend on whether the Charter is annexed to the EU Treaty or to a new Treaty in the form of a Protocol. In the first case, the Charter would acquire a binding character, whereas in the second case its status would not change. A problem, however, would arise as to the existing reference in Article 6(2) to the rights enshrined in ECHR because the majority of rights stipulated in the Charter are based on the Convention. A reference to the Charter without changing its status would mean a mere formal acknowledgement of the rights enshrined in the Charter as general principles, an approach emerging in the case law of the Court of Justice. The rights enshrined in the Charter could be interpreted and applied by the Court of Justice on the basis of the structure and goals of the Community in the same way as it presently interprets the ECHR or the rights stipulated in the constitutions of the member states. In this case, the rights enshrined in Charter would serve as a basis for the repeal of acts of Community institutions if the Court of Justice establishes that the latter are in conflict with these rights. The provisions of the Charter would be binding on the member states as general principles of Community law with all the consequences thereof: they would have to comply with them in implementing the Community law, the national courts would have to refrain from applying provisions of national law that go counter to them, and in cases of non-compliance, member states would be liable for breach of Treaty obligations.

C. Incorporation of the Charter in the Form of a Separate Protocol annexed to the Treaty.

Since both international and Community law treats protocols as an integral part of a Treaty, the Charter would acquire the same legal value as the Treaty. This option would be in line with the wishes of some member states to see the Charter as a separate document and would provide a solution if no EU Constitution were adopted.

D. Incorporation of the Charter into the EU Treaty or into a new basic Treaty. If the provisions of the Charter are inserted into the Treaty, they would acquire a binding status, like in option C. The difference from option C would be purely technical (option C would be technically simpler). I believe that effective implementation of human rights is only possible when the document is binding.

Relationship between the Charter and the ECHR

If the Charter remains declarative in character, its relationship with the Convention would not change. According to Article 52(3) of the Charter, the rights (their content and scope, including limitations) which correspond to rights guaranteed by the ECHR are to be interpreted in the same way as the rights laid down by the Convention. The official commentary of the Charter contains a list of correspondence between the rights stipulated by the Charter and the Convention. The rights are broken down into three groups in the list: the rights that correspond to the ones enshrined in the ECHR; the rights the application of which is broader; and the rights not stipulated by the Convention. Since this commentary has no binding legal force, some authors believe that Article 52(3) does not rule out the possibility of conflicting interpretation of the rights by the Court of Justice and the European Court of Human Rights because the problem of identification of these rights remains open. Advocates of the Charter claim that provisions of Article 52(3) and 53 eliminate this problem because, in the case of collision, the Convention would have precedence over the Charter except the cases when Community legislation offers a more effective protection of rights. An analysis of rights enshrined in the Charter shows that a considerable number of them correspond to those in the Convention. One is justified in thinking that the drafters of the Charter tried to avoid a collision between the two documents. It is important to note that even prior to the adoption of the Charter there existed two independent mechanisms for the protection of fundamental rights (one to be found in Community law and the other in the form of Convention). Thus already before the Charter was adopted there were cases of courts interpreting the provisions of the Convention differently. I would think that problems would only arise in cases if the Charter offers a lower level of protection than that established by the Convention. This variant would hardly be acceptable because it would call for the application of different standards of protection of rights. Articles 52(3) and 53 of the Charter rule such a situation out by stating: “Nothing in this Charter shall be interpreted as restricting or adversely affecting human rights and fundamental freedoms as recognised by ... the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms” (Art. 53). I believe, therefore, that the opinion by some of the authors that the Charter poses a threat to the protection of rights enshrined in the ECHR has no grounds.

Compared with the Convention, the Charter has some advantages. The Charter’s scope of application is broader. Alongside political and civil rights of the EU citizen it also embraces social, economic and the “new” rights: the right to good administration, the right to environmental protection, and the right of access to documents. Some of the rights had been modified to take into account the developments after the adoption of the Convention and the case law of the European Court of Human Rights.

If the Charter is granted a legal character, member states would be bound by the same obligations vis-à-vis the Charter as vis-à-vis any other act of EU primary legislation. Depending on the character of amendments introduced to Article 6 of the EU Treaty, adjustments would have to be made to the provisions of Article 52(3) with regard to the relationship between the Charter and the ECHR.

Competencies of the ECJ

If the Charter were incorporated into the EU Treaty, the European Court of Justice would play the key role in the protection of rights enshrined in it (if decision is not made to set up a new institution for this purpose). It is therefore important to ensure that Article 46 or another similar article is changed accordingly, in order to grant the Court jurisdiction in this field.

In case such a decision is adopted, another issue would arise, i.e. who would have the right of legal action in cases related to the implementation of rights enshrined in the Charter. First of all, the standard forms of actions would have to be used:

- Actions by the Commission against member states for violations of the Charter’s provisions;
- Actions by the Institutions, member states, and individuals aimed at repealing EU legal acts, also actions in relation to institutions’ failure to act and to compensation for damage caused by institutions when the basis for the action is a violation of the Charter.

- Preliminary ruling procedure (ECJ, when requested by national courts of member states, could offer an opinion on the compliance of national measures or acts of EU institutions with the Charter).

The possibilities for individuals to take direct action before the ECJ against violations of the Charter by a member state or an EU Institution deserve to be considered separately (presently, the possibilities of direct appeal by individuals to the ECJ are very limited). In order to enable individuals to protect their rights enshrined in the Charter, either the grounds for taking the various existing forms of action have to be expanded or a new special form of action in relation to violations of human rights, and requirements for such an action, have to be introduced. The latter variant, in the opinion of Lithuanian experts, would not be expedient because this type of violation usually interrelates with a specific form of existing actions.

It must be noted that in case the EC/EU does not accede to the ECHR, the ECJ will be the last instance both in cases related to the violation of rights enshrined in the ECHR and stipulated in the Charter and those related to other fundamental rights. At the same time, the compliance with the Charter in member states will have to be ensured by national authorities and national courts. Individuals would be able to seek protection against violations of rights enshrined in the ECHR before the European Court of Human Rights, while this Court would not offer protection against the other rights which are stipulated in the Charter. Thus the Charter provisions would not have equal legal value and consequences vis-à-vis acts of member states. On all the rights stipulated in the Charter, the ECJ would be able to offer its opinion through the preliminary ruling procedure.

If the Charter is not granted legal character, the ECJ would be able to make references to and interpret the rights stipulated in the Charter; but in this case, too, the question of collision of jurisdictions of the ECJ and the European Court of Human Rights remains open.

Some authors believe that the only way to avoid this collision is accession by the EC/EU to the ECHR. It is important to underline that the Charter is not an alternative to the accession by the EC/EU to the ECHR. The accession of the EC/EU to the ECHR poses a number of problems. Adequate attention, therefore

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

It is recalled that, at their 747th meeting (28 March 2001, item 2.3b), the Ministers' Deputies decided to give ad hoc terms of reference to the Steering Committee for Human Rights (CDDH) to carry out "a study of the legal and technical issues that would have to be addressed by the Council of Europe in the event of possible accession by the European Communities/European Union to the European Convention on Human Rights, as well as of the other means to avoid any contradiction between the legal system of the European Communities/Union and the system of the European Convention on Human Rights".

At its 52nd meeting the CDDH decided to this end to set up a working group on legal and technical issues of possible EC/EU accession to the European Convention on Human Rights (GT-DH-EU). The Group, which was chaired by Mr Jan LATHOUWERS (Belgium), held two meetings in Strasbourg (Human Rights Building), on 30 January-1 February 2002 and on 11-13 March 2002. At the end of its second meeting, it adopted an activity report (GT-DH-EU(2002)012). This report was examined and approved by the CDDH at its 53rd meeting (25-28 June 2002). The present document contains the activity report as adopted by the CDDH.

At the outset, the CDDH wishes to stress that, in accordance with its terms of reference, it has refrained from addressing political issues concerning the advisability of such accession. It also avoided to examine questions which are really for the EC/EU to decide upon. It has limited its work to considering what legal and technical adjustments would be necessary in the context of the Council of Europe, particularly in terms of amendments to the ECHR, to make accession possible. The purpose of this Activity Report is merely to identify and clarify those legal and technical issues, which might be useful in the context of any future decisions on the question of accession.

For clarification purposes, some drafting examples are included in Appendix I to this report. They are not to be regarded as proposals of the CDDH.

CHAPTER I – MODALITIES OF ACCESSION FROM THE POINT OF VIEW OF TREATY LAW

I. Introduction

1. Accession must be distinguished from signature and ratification as means of expressing consent to be bound by a treaty (Article 11 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties). In accordance with Article 59, paragraph 1 of the Convention the member States of the Council of Europe become parties to the Convention through signature followed by ratification. However, when existing Council of Europe treaties have been opened to the participation of the EC/EU, it was usually provided that the latter expresses its consent to be bound by means of accession (eg. the Protocol to the Convention on the Elaboration of a European Pharmacopoeia, ETS 134). The CDDH has taken accession as its working hypothesis.

2. The CDDH has identified three broad categories of provisions that may be necessary or desirable in the event of accession by the EC/EU to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and its Protocols:

- a) amendments to the text of provisions already contained in the ECHR and its Protocols;
- b) supplementary provisions e.g. provisions clarifying the scope of terms used in the ECHR; adapting them to the special case of the EC/EU, etc. (e.g. terms with a “national” connotation; see Chapter II, point B.1 and A2 option 2);
- c) any technical and administrative issues not pertaining to the text of the Convention but for which a legal basis would be useful, such as the conditions of the budgetary contribution of the EC/EU.

3. In addition, some accommodation in respect of two ancillary agreements would be necessary to accompany EC/EU accession to the ECHR (see under point IV below).

II. Option 1: An amending protocol to the ECHR

Contents

4. All provisions of the type mentioned under a) could be included in an amending protocol. Protocol No. 11 to the ECHR (ETS 155) amended provisions of the Convention itself and of all additional protocols existing at that time (Protocols No. 1, 4, 6 and 7).

5. An amending protocol may also contain supplementary and/or transitional provisions that do not amend the text of the original treaty itself, but remain in force even after the entry into force of the amended text of the Convention. A good example is again Protocol No. 11 to the ECHR. Its Article 5 provided the necessary transitional provisions for the treatment of applications lodged before its entry into force. Article 6 made clear that temporal restrictions made with respect to declarations under former Articles 25 and 46 of the ECHR (which were both abrogated by Protocol No. 11) remained valid for the jurisdiction of the new Court.

6. Inclusion of provisions of the type mentioned under b) in an amending protocol could therefore also be envisaged. There is an advantage in doing so. If these provisions were not included in the amended version of the Convention, the EC/EU would not give its formal consent to be bound by them, because the amending protocol would only be signed and ratified by the current States Parties to the ECHR.<sup>1</sup>

7. Provisions of the type mentioned under c) are perhaps less suitable for inclusion in an amending protocol. They could be included in a separate agreement to be concluded directly between the Council of Europe and the EC/EU. Since it would only contain provisions of a technical character, it would not be necessary that all States Parties become Parties to such an agreement. However, it would be useful if a general legal basis for such an agreement be included in the Convention, as amended, at least as far as the EC/EU's financial contribution is concerned (cf. mutatis mutandis, Article 50 of the Convention). Such a legal basis could be provided in a supplementary provision of the type mentioned under b).

Modalities for the entry into force of an amending protocol

8. Every amending Protocol to the ECHR concluded to date has provided for entry into force after signature and ratification or acceptance by all the States Parties to the Convention, which typically takes a few years.<sup>2</sup> For a drafting example see below in Appendix I (Part V. - Entry into force of the amending protocol/accession treaty).

9. In theory, in order to speed up the entry into force of an Amending Protocol, a “tacit acceptance clause” might be envisaged. Such a clause has for example been introduced into the Protocol amending the European Convention on Transfrontier Television (ETS 171, 1998) providing for automatic entry into force following the expiration of a period of two years, in the absence of any objection. The use of such a clause does not prevent States from using their traditional domestic procedures and from depositing an instrument of ratification or acceptance. However, after a fixed period of time (e.g. two years), the Protocol would enter into force automatically unless a Party to the Convention notifies the Secretary General of the Council of Europe of an objection to its entry into force.

10. On the other hand, such tacit acceptance procedures have only been used in the Council of Europe, and more generally in international treaty practice, for relatively technical instruments raising few or minor issues of policy. That is far from the situation here. EC/EU accession would on any view, be a major innovation with important consequences for the Convention control mechanism and it clearly raises many significant policy issues. For such an instrument to enter into force without the positive consent to be bound of all the parties would be unprecedented, and accordingly unlikely to be considered appropriate or acceptable by the High Contracting Parties to the Convention.

III. Option 2: An accession treaty

11. Instead of concluding an amending protocol between the current States Parties to the ECHR, it could be envisaged to conclude an accession treaty between all States Parties to the ECHR and the

<sup>2</sup> E.g. Protocol No. 11 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ETS 155) was opened for signature on 11 May 1994 and, having obtained all necessary ratifications in October 1997, entered into force on 1 November 1998.

EC/EU. Such a procedure is used within the European Union for the admission of new member States. Article 49 paragraph 2 of the EU Treaty provides that the conditions of admission and the adjustments to the EU Treaties “shall be the subject of an agreement between the member States and the applicant State”. The accession agreement usually consists of a rather short text and – annexed – an Act concerning the conditions and adjustments to the Treaties, forming an integral part of the accession agreement. Furthermore, the Act contains single and joint Declarations made by the Contracting States when signing the agreement. All States concerned, i.e. the EU member States and the candidate countries, ratify the accession agreement in accordance with their respective constitutional requirements. They do not sign or ratify the EU Treaties as such, but are considered automatically Parties to them upon entry into force of the accession agreement.

12. The main differences between the use of the traditional procedure of an amending protocol and the use of an accession treaty are that:

- ❑ the EC/EU as such would be directly bound by all the provisions of the accession treaty, including those that do not amend the original Convention or its Protocols;
- ❑ instead of having a two-tier procedure (first adoption and ratification of the amending protocol by all States Parties to the ECHR, then accession by the EC/EU to the amended Convention), there would be a single procedure which would result in the EC/EU being a Party to the revised ECHR upon entry into force of the accession treaty<sup>3</sup>. Provision could be made for EC/EU accession to the additional protocols simultaneously or at a later date.
- ❑ an accession treaty could more easily contain all the different types of provisions a), b) and c) mentioned in the introduction above. It could also contain the necessary amending and other clauses concerning the ancillary treaties (See Chapter III below and Appendix I Part VI – Amendments to ancillary agreements).

<sup>3</sup> In other words, the EC/EU would not have to wait for the entry into force of an amending protocol before starting the procedures required under Union law to accede to the Convention. According to Opinion 2/94 of the ECJ, accession would require amendments to the Treaty. Such amendments would have to be adopted in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 48 of the EU Treaty before accession (Article 300 paragraph 5 of the EC Treaty).

13. An accession treaty could contain all the different types of provisions mentioned in the introduction. It could contain separate chapters for each type:

- a) Chapter I: Amendments to the ECHR;
- b) Chapter II: Amendments to the Protocols;
- c) Chapter III: Supplementary provisions;
- d) Chapter IV: Technical and administrative issues;
- e) Chapter V – Clause relating to ancillary agreements;
- f) Chapter VI – Entry into force of the accession treaty.

Entry into force of an accession treaty

14. See paragraphs 8-10 above. In addition, entry into force of an accession treaty would also require that the EC/EU expresses its consent to be bound by the treaty, by way of ratification.

15. For a drafting example see below in Appendix I (Part V - Entry into force of the amending protocol/accession treaty)

IV. Ancillary treaties

16. The ancillary agreements that would need to be amended are: (i) the European Agreement relating to Persons Participating in Proceedings of the European Court of Human Rights (ETS No. 161) and (ii) the Sixth Protocol to the General Agreement on Privileges and Immunities of the Council of Europe (ETS No. 162).

17. With respect of the first of these treaties the changes could be included either in an amending protocol containing also the amendments suggested for the Convention and its Protocols or in an accession treaty. The solution indicated below for the Sixth Protocol could also be used.

18. The situation is different with respect to the Sixth Protocol to the General Agreement on Privileges and Immunities, which can only be ratified by member States to the Council of Europe which are also Parties to the General Agreement. This Protocol would therefore need to be amended in a separate text or, alternatively, which would be the simplest solution, a clause could be included in an accession treaty to the effect that the European Communities (European Union) shall respect the provisions contained in the Protocol. That solution could also be used in respect of the European Agreement relating to Persons Participating in Proceedings of the European Court of Human Rights.

19. A drafting example for the latter alternative is contained in Appendix I (Part VI – Accommodations in respect of ancillary agreements).

V. Final remarks

20. The CDDH noted that both solutions mentioned above are technically feasible as modalities of accession from the point of view of treaty law. It also noted several advantages in opting for an accession treaty. It considered that which option to choose was a matter that extended beyond the remit of the current terms of reference given to the CDDH.

CHAPTER II – OVERVIEW OF LEGAL AND TECHNICAL ISSUES AND CORRESPONDING POSSIBLE AMENDMENTS SOLUTIONS

A. Points on which amendment of the ECHR would be required:

1. Article 59, paragraphs 1 and 4 ECHR (including the question of who should be allowed to accede: the European Communities or the European Union)

21. According to Article 59 only member States of the Council of Europe may sign and ratify the ECHR. This provision would have to be amended in order to enable the EC/EU to accede.

22. It is recalled that of the three pillars that constitute the European Union, for the time being, only the first pillar, the European Communities, undoubtedly enjoys legal personality and can conclude international agreements with States or international organisations. However, there is a debate within the EU on the question of legal personality of the EU (second and third pillars: Common Foreign and Security Policy; Police and Judicial Cooperation in Criminal Matters) and as to whether or not the distinction between EC and EU should be reviewed (cf. inter alia, the Laeken Declaration).

23. Since the situation is uncertain in this respect, three different solutions could be envisaged all of which would allow for the necessary flexibility in case the EU would be authorised to accede to the Convention. These are:

(i) to amend Article 59, paragraph 1 by adding a phrase to the effect that the European Communities<sup>4</sup>/Union may accede to the Convention;<sup>5</sup>

(ii) to amend Article 59, paragraph 1 by adding a phrase to the effect that the European Communities may accede to the Convention. In a separate paragraph, or in a separate provision in the amending protocol, to provide that the European Union may accede in the event of it having been authorised to do so;

(iii) to include a reference in Article 59, paragraph 1 to the possibility for international organisations to accede to the Convention. Under this solution, it would probably be advisable to provide that such accession would be open only to organisations so invited by the Committee of Ministers (cf., mutatis mutandis, e.g. Article 29, paragraph 1 of the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities).

24. All three alternatives would imply amendments to Article 59, paragraph 4 as well, by mentioning “accession” in addition to “ratification” and by adding “and the European Communities/Union” (options (i) and (ii)) or “and any other Contracting Parties” (option (iii)).

<sup>4</sup> The normal practice within the Council of Europe when the European Communities have acceded to a Convention has been to refer to “the European Communities” in the provision opening the treaty for accession.

25. Whether in actual fact only the European Communities or also, possibly at a later stage, the European Union would accede will depend on decisions within the European Union, as regards both the legal personality of the latter and the question of its legal capacity to accede.
26. The “scope” of EC/EU accession would be limited to issues in respect of which the EC/EU has competence. This has always been the understanding in respect of Council of Europe Conventions to which the EC has acceded. Nonetheless, it might in respect of the ECHR be considered useful to make this understanding explicit either in a general declaration of competence (analogous to the declaration made in connection with the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea) or, alternatively, in the text of the provision allowing accession, for example by adding the words: “... to the extent of its competences”.
27. The solutions indicated above could be adapted also to allow for EC/EU accession to the protocols to the Convention.
28. Hesitations were expressed as to the question of whether the EC/EU would be able to accede to protocols that were not ratified by all its member States. However, it was considered that this should not be an obstacle for at least preparing the instruments so as to make accession possible. It was stressed that the question of accession to the protocols must ultimately be left to the EC/EU.
29. For reasons of simplicity, the drafting examples included in Appendix I below reflect only alternative (i) above. The entity that would accede to the Convention is designated as the (European Communities) (European Union). A definitive designation will have to be made at the moment of the negotiation of accession with the EC/EU.
- 2. ECHR provisions referring to “State” or “States”: Article 10, paragraph 1; Article 11, paragraph 2; Article 17; Article 27, paragraphs 2 and 3, Article 38, paragraph 1.a, Article 56, paragraphs 1 and 4, Article 57, paragraph 1.
30. In the above-mentioned provisions the term “State” can be considered as a synonym for the term “High Contracting Party” used elsewhere in the Convention.

Option 1: These provisions could be amended, adding an explicit reference to the “European Communities/Union” or using the neutral term “High Contracting Party”, which would cover both States and the European Communities/Union.<sup>6</sup>

Option 2: It might be preferable from a point of view of legislative technique to include a general interpretation clause in the amending Protocol which would eg provide that “References to a “State” or to “States” shall be understood as references to the broader notions of a “High Contracting Party” and “High Contracting Parties” respectively.” This option would have the advantage of avoiding amendments to a series of individual ECHR provisions.<sup>7</sup>

31. These would be formal amendments which would not entail any substantive change in the nature or scope of obligations under the Convention.

32. The solutions indicated above could be adapted also to allow for EC/EU accession to the protocols to the Convention.

33. Drafting examples are contained in Appendix I (for Option 1: Parts I and II; for Option 2: Part III).

3. Article 46, paragraph 2 ECHR (supervision of execution of judgments); representative of the EC/EU in the Committee of Ministers; need for a Statutory Resolution?

34. The current situation as regards participation in the Committee of Ministers meetings generally is as follows. Following an exchange of letters between the President of the European

<sup>6</sup> As to the expression “Inter-State cases” in the title of Article 36, ECHR, see under point B.5 below. However, an individual amendment to Article 57, paragraph 1 would probably still be necessary but for another reason: in order to allow the EC/EU to make reservations upon accession, the words “or accession” should be inserted after the word “ratification” (see Appendix I, Part I).

Commission and the Secretary General of the Council of Europe<sup>8</sup>, representatives of the European Commission have been authorised to attend the meetings and activities of the Council of Europe's Committee of Ministers. However, the exchange of letters stated that the Commission will not enjoy voting rights and will not be involved in the Organisation's decision-making process.

35. According to Article 14 of the Statute of the Council of Europe, only member States may be present and vote in the Committee of Ministers, each member State having one vote. Article 46, paragraph 2 of the Convention should therefore be amended to allow the EC/EU to participate with the right to vote in meetings of the Committee of Ministers when the latter exercises its functions under this provision.

36. The question arises whether the Statute of the Council of Europe also needs to be amended. However, from the point of view of treaty law, it could be considered that an amendment to Article 46, paragraph 2 of the Convention would have the status of a later lex specialis, which would take precedence over the general rules contained in the Statute of the Council of Europe.<sup>9</sup> On the other hand, the opposite view could also be defended.

37. The amendment of the Convention might be accompanied by the adoption of a statutory resolution authorising the participation of the EC/EU, although this might not be strictly necessary. Thus, the cumbersome procedure of an amendment to the Statute of the Council of Europe could be avoided.

38. It would seem logical that, as any other Party to the Convention, the EC/EU would be entitled to one vote. It could be argued that the EC/EU's sphere of competence is more limited than the sovereignty of States and that this would justify some limitation of EC/EU participation in the supervision of execution of judgments. This argument might carry more weight here (Article 46, paragraph 2) than in the context of participation of an EC/EU judge in the Court (see point C.1

<sup>8</sup> Exchange of letters agreed upon at the 575th meeting of the Minister's Deputies (14-17 October 1997).

<sup>9</sup> See Article 30 (3) of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties: "When all the parties to the earlier treaty are parties also to the later treaty but the earlier treaty is not terminated or suspended in operation under Article 59, the earlier treaty applies only to the extent that its provisions are compatible with those of the later treaty".

below) since the role of the representative in the Committee of Ministers can not be compared to that of an independent judge. However, it could also be argued that, in view of the principle of collective enforcement of the rights contained in the Convention, it would be unjustified to limit the right to vote only to the supervision of judgments involving EC/EU law, which would give rise to an asymmetrical situation vis-à-vis other Contracting Parties.

39. For a drafting example (Article 46, paragraph 2) see Appendix I (Part I).

B. Points on which amendment of the ECHR (although such amendment might be deemed advisable) might not be necessary

1. Terminology used in some of the ECHR restriction clauses (eg: “national security”, “economic well-being of the country”, “territorial integrity”, “national laws”; cf. paragraph 2 of Articles 8, 10, 11 and Article 12, ECHR) and the reference to “nation” in Article 15, paragraph 1, ECHR

40. It would appear to be justified to apply these terms, where applicable, mutatis mutandis, to the European Communities/European Union. In its 1979 Memorandum, the European Commission took the position that “it should be sufficient to lay down in an accession protocol (...) that the Convention, when it uses terms relating specifically to States, also applies mutatis mutandis to the European Communities”. It is understood that this solution would not entail discretion as to the applicability of these terms to the EC/EU.

41. Such a solution would certainly be preferable to attempting to redefine each term so as to tailor them to the EC/EU, which would be a highly complicated exercise.

42. It could be envisaged that a provision to this effect appear only in the amending protocol to the ECHR or in an accession treaty, and not in the amended text of the Convention itself.<sup>10</sup>

---

<sup>10</sup> There are precedents for such provisions, e.g. Articles 5 and 6 of Protocol No. 11 to the ECHR.

43. The solutions indicated above could be adapted also to allow for EC/EU accession to the protocols to the Convention.

44. Drafting examples are contained in Appendix I (Part III).

2. Question of the EC/EU contribution to the expenditure on the Court (cf. Article 50, ECHR)

45. According to Article 50 of the Convention, the expenditure on the Court shall be borne by the Council of Europe. The question of the EC/EU's contribution to the expenditure on the control system of the Convention (which also includes supervision of execution of judgments, cf. Article 46, paragraph 2 ECHR) in case of accession would need to be negotiated between the Council of Europe and the EC/EU.

46. In fact, as the Court's budget is not separate from that of the Council of Europe, an EC/EU contribution should be made via the ordinary budget of the Council of Europe from which all expenses linked to the Convention control mechanism were paid. It may be necessary to create a legal basis, although it may be of a general character, for this contribution.

47. Such a provision could be included in an amending protocol to the Convention or in an accession treaty in a general formula, with more specific details, notably about the basis for calculation of the contribution, provided in a separate agreement. For a drafting example for a general provision, see below in the Appendix (Part IV – Technical and administrative questions). This would be a supplementary provision; Article 50 itself would not have to be amended.

3. Article 35, paragraph 2.b, ECHR (“another procedure of international investigation or settlement”)

48. Irrespective of the question of whether the procedure before the Luxembourg Court should today be considered as a procedure of “international investigation or settlement” in the sense of Article 35, paragraph 2.b of the ECHR<sup>11</sup>, it is clear that the answer would be negative as a necessary consequence of accession. Indeed, application of the ECHR control system would be an important object and purpose of accession by the EC/EU to the ECHR and the mere fact that a case has been dealt with by the Luxembourg Court should not prevent the Strasbourg Court from accepting an application as admissible.

49. After accession by the EC/EU, the remedies existing in the legal system of this Contracting Party would have to be considered as domestic remedies within the meaning of Article 35, paragraph 1 of the ECHR. On this point, one could have in mind, inter alia, the procedures before the Court of First Instance and the European Court of Justice.

4. Participation of the EC/EU in proceedings before the Court (as Respondent, amicus curiae or otherwise)

50. First of all, the EC/EU would, in case an application is brought against it before the Court, participate in the proceedings like any other Respondent.

51. Secondly, the EC/EU could, like other Contracting Parties, be invited under Article 36, paragraph 2, ECHR to submit written comments or take part in hearings.

52. On both of these points, no amendment of the ECHR would be required.

53. Thirdly, a question arises in connection with respect to Article 36, paragraph 1, ECHR. This provision gives a right of third party intervention to a High Contracting Party one of whose “nationals” is an applicant.

54. The Treaty establishing the European Community uses the term “citizens of the Union” which is defined by reference to the nationality of a member State (Article 17 of the EC Treaty). It is not considered necessary to replace the term “nationals” by “citizens” in Article 36 of the ECHR or to specify, in the amending Protocol, that the term “nationals” in this provision shall include

<sup>11</sup> The issue has been raised in a case pending before the European Court of Human Rights (the case DSR-Senator Lines).

“citizens of the Union” within the meaning of EC/EU law. The term “nationals” would already cover the “citizens of the Union”.

55. It must be underlined that giving the EC/EU the right to intervene each time one of its citizens is applicant in a case, might, in theory, lead to a large number of interventions.<sup>12</sup> It would have to be decided whether the EC/EU should be allowed to intervene in cases brought against any State. This would mean a “double” right of intervention: one for the EC/EU and one for the member State of which the applicant is a national. Another possibility could be that the EC/EU be given the possibility to intervene only in cases brought against non-member States of the European Union. This question could possibly be solved by an agreement between the EC/EU and its member States, or through an accession agreement between all parties concerned. It is noted that Article 36, paragraph 1 reflects the notion of diplomatic protection and that, within the EU, it is not the Organisation but its component member States that provide such protection for their nationals.

56. In view of the fact that the member States of the Union already have the right to intervene on behalf of their nationals under Article 36, paragraph 1, it may be that the possibility provided for in Article 36, paragraph 2, to request that the President of the Court enable, in this case, the EC/EU to intervene in a particular case, would be sufficient.

Participation as “co-Defendant”?

57. In the fourth place, a separate issue is whether it would be advisable to introduce special rules for the EC/EU, allowing it to participate in the proceedings whenever issues of Community law are at stake in a case before the Strasbourg Court, taking into consideration, in particular, the desirability of giving an opportunity to the EC/EU to defend itself in such a case as well as the fact that with a view to a possible execution of a judgment, it might be useful to ensure the co-operation of the EC/EU (enforceability). This would perhaps be useful in cases concerning an alleged violation of the ECHR by an EC/EU member State on account of a measure taken by that State in implementation of EC/EU law. There might even be a need to oblige the EC/EU to intervene in such a delicate situation.

<sup>12</sup> In accordance with current practice, the EC/EU would be informed about all cases in which it could in principle intervene.

58. It would seem difficult to regulate this question in the context of Article 36, since the idea here would be that the EC/EU take part in the proceedings not by way of a third party intervention, but as a co-Defendant, a fundamentally different situation.

59. Consideration was given to the possibility of introducing a mechanism under which the EC/EU could be invited or even obliged to join the case as a co-Defendant, alongside the EC/EU member state against which the application was initially brought. In principle, various options for such a scheme could be envisaged, depending on whether the EC/EU would have a right or an obligation to join the proceedings as co-Defendant, and on whether acquiring co-Defendant status would be the consequence of an unilateral decision by a Defendant State, of a decision proprio motu by the EC/EU, or of an initiative taken by the Court. It would probably be difficult to give the Court the power to oblige the EC/EU to join a case as co-Defendant, for this might be seen as prejudging questions relating to the respective responsibilities of the Contracting Parties or in effect render inoperative certain admissibility criteria in respect of the EC/EU (eg: 6 months rule). It might be more appropriate merely to provide a legal basis in the Convention, by virtue of which the EC/EU may, in cases which appear to raise an issue involving Community or Union law, with the leave of the Court, join the EC/EU member State against which the case had been brought as a party to the proceedings. It was understood that the Court's decision to grant leave would be of a purely procedural nature, in the interest of the proper administration of justice. It was also understood that the EC/EU and its member States would normally not be precluded from coordinating among themselves whether or not leave should be sought under such a mechanism, in a given case or in a more general fashion. This could be explained in an Explanatory Report. It could be envisaged that such a mechanism apply only in respect of cases pending before a Chamber or the Grand Chamber (cf., mutatis mutandis, Article 36, paragraph 1 of the Convention).

60. Since such a mechanism would cover, in particular, situations in which there is, arguably, a question of "mixed" responsibility under the Convention between the EC/EU and one of its member States, it would appear logical to open the same possibility, also for the inverse situation: ie: giving a EC/EU member State the possibility to seek leave to join the proceedings as a co-Defendant where the case has been brought against the EC/EU.

61. The question arises whether possibilities should be created for an individual applicant to seek to have the EC/EU (in case the application was brought against an EC/EU member State) or an EC/EU member State (in case the application was brought against the EC/EU) joined to the proceedings as co-Defendant. This could be relevant where applicants had possibly erred in their decision to introduce their application only against the EC/EU or only against an EC/EU member State. The point could be made that, formally at least, the individual has the choice against which Contracting Party he or she wishes to introduce an application. In this respect the applicant's position is not comparable to that of the Defendant. Furthermore, it was noted that, during the initial stages of the introduction of an application, the individual might be given some possibility to "redirect" the application or specify that the application is also directed against a second (or more) Contracting Party/Parties. For the same reasons as set out in paragraph 59 above in relation to the idea of empowering the Court to oblige a Contracting Party to join the proceedings as co-Defendant, it would probably be difficult to give the Court a power to "redirect" the case so as to involve another or an additional Defendant. It should also be noted that introduction of a mechanism allowing for the addition of co-Defendants or for one Defendant to call another as outlined above would also be beneficial to applicants who are in the situation described here.

62. A drafting example for a provision containing a mechanism as described above (a possible "Article 35bis" of the Convention) is contained in Appendix I, Part III. Some indication is also given of implementing provisions (communication of cases to which such a system would apply; time-limits for seeking leave) which could possibly be taken up in the Rules of Court.

5. Article 33, ECHR ("Inter-State" cases; question of whether inter-Party applications should be possible without limitation)

63. Article 33 of the ECHR, while entitled "Inter-State cases", uses the term "High Contracting Party". The heading was introduced by means of Article 2 of Protocol No. 11, ECHR and, as with other headings so introduced, it should not be understood as an interpretation of the Article itself or as having any legal effect. The headings have been added in order to make the text of the Convention more easily understandable (see the Explanatory report to Protocol No. 11, § 114). Therefore, the legal position under the ECHR is that accession would mean that all States Parties to the Convention, including EU member States, could bring a case against the European Communities/Union and vice versa, in line with the principle of collective enforcement of the ECHR. Changing the heading to "Inter-Party cases" would make it correspond better to the content of Article 33.

64. On the other hand, it is recalled that EU member States are prohibited from submitting disputes “concerning the interpretation or application of this Treaty to any method of settlement other than those provided for therein” (Article 292 of the EC Treaty)<sup>13</sup>. The Treaty of Amsterdam introduced a special procedure in cases of “serious and persistent breach by a Member State of principles mentioned in Article 6 (1)”. Article 6 (1) of the EU Treaty refers to “the principles of liberty, democracy, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the rule of law”.

65. The question may therefore arise whether there would be a need for an amendment with a view to excluding any ECHR disputes involving EC/EU law from the scope of application of Article 33. Such an amendment would probably not be necessary since the issue is really one of EC/EU law and both EU member States and the EC/EU may in practice be expected to use Article 33 only to the extent that such use is compatible with their obligations under EC/EU treaties. It would be for the EC/EU and its member States to decide whether or not this matter should be addressed in an agreement between themselves, as long as such an agreement would not institute a system of submitting, by way of petition, a dispute arising out of the interpretation or application of the ECHR, to a means of settlement other than those provided for in the ECHR (cf. Article 55, ECHR (exclusion of other means of dispute settlement)).

C. Other issues (NB: depending on the option(s) retained and modalities to be chosen, amendment of the ECHR might be required)

1. Status and participation in the European Court of Human Rights of the judge elected in respect of the EC/EU

66. Under the current provisions of the ECHR, the Court consists of a number of judges equal to that of the High Contracting Parties (Article 20) and each High Contracting Party nominates three candidates, one of which is elected by the Parliamentary Assembly with respect to that Party (Article 22, paragraph 1).

67. This principle of one judge in respect of each Contracting Party is based on the following main considerations and advantages: representation of each legal system in the Court; expertise on each legal system in the Court, participation of each Contracting Party in the system of collective enforcement set up by the Convention which entailed duties but also certain prerogatives; it contributes to the legitimacy of the decisions taken by the Court.

68. Whether or not there should be a judge elected in respect of the EC/EU and, if so, whether that judge should participate on an equal footing with the other judges in the work of the Court depends on an evaluation of the relevance and weight of the above-mentioned considerations in regard to the EC/EU as a Contracting Party, in combination with the significance attached, respectively, to features that distinguish the EC/EU from States Parties, and features that make the EC/EU comparable to a State Party. On the latter point, the view was advanced that the EC/EU did not possess the fullness of sovereign competence which is the attribute of a State. On the other hand, the view was also expressed that the EC had a distinct legal personality from its member States, that its actions do enter the human rights field and that member States of the EC/EU did no longer have full sovereign competence since they had transferred competences to the EC/EU.

69. The – rather theoretical - argument could be made that there would be no need for a judge elected in respect of the EC/EU as there were 15 judges on the Court elected in respect of its member States. However, this option of having no EC/EU judge was discarded since it would not be justified in the light of the main considerations mentioned in paragraph 67 above.

70. A second option, based on the same somewhat theoretical argument, could be to appoint an EC/EU judge on an ad hoc basis, for cases involving Community law. This option would perhaps partly meet the expertise argument, but be difficult to justify in the light of the other main considerations mentioned in paragraph 67 above. It also presented several other disadvantages, some of a more or less practical character:

- it would have to be decided for each case whether it involved Community law or not, which may cause difficulties in practice;
- if there were many cases requiring the participation of an EC/EU judge, ad hoc appointments would need to be made continuously which would be an extra burden for the Court;

- as ad hoc judges are not elected by the Parliamentary Assembly, there would be a problem of legitimacy with respect to the EC/EU judge if systematic recourse were to be had to ad hoc judges in respect of that Contracting party alone.

71. A third option would be to provide for a full-time EC/EU judge with limited participation (only in cases involving EC/EU law). In support of this option, it could be argued that it would be awkward for a member State of the EC/EU to be judged by an EC/EU judge in cases concerning areas for which the EC/EU did not have competence (eg: child care cases). Against this, it could be said that, already now, States with a tradition of a comparatively high level of State intervention are being judged by a judge elected in respect of a country where the State plays a less prominent role.

72. An argument against this option would again be that it may be difficult in practice to establish which cases would require the presence of the EC/EU judge and which cases would not. Also, it was highly doubtful whether this option would be justifiable in the light of some of the main considerations mentioned in paragraph 67 above (notably that relating to the participation of the Contracting States in a collective system of enforcement).

73. Most arguments could be made for a fourth option, which would be the presence of a full-time EC/EU judge participating on an equal footing with other judges. This solution would fully meet the main considerations mentioned in paragraph 67 above, and be most in line with the spirit of the Convention system. Judges do not “represent” any country or area: they are impartial and independent. Providing for special rules in the Convention in respect of the EC/EU judge might carry with it the unfortunate suggestion that that judge might be less impartial and independent. It is true that this solution would not reflect the features that distinguish the EC/EU from States Parties to the Convention, notably its more limited competence. However, as stated above, some of the current Parties to the Convention (the EU member States) no longer possess full competence in matters governed by the Convention. Making a distinction between the EC/EU judge and the other judges based on the limited and attributed competence of the EC would be problematic also because the division of competence between the EC/EU and its member States is constantly evolving.

74. It could be considered that, ultimately, the manner in which the Court would organise the participation of judges, including that of an EC/EU judge, in its judicial decision-making is a matter that is more appropriately left to the Court itself<sup>14</sup>. The same would apply to the question of whether a “special chamber” should be set up within the Court in order to deal with cases against the EC/EU or involving EC/EU law. However, it should be noted that a chamber composed exclusively of judges elected in respect of the EC/EU and its member States would run counter to the philosophy of the Convention system.

2. Introduction of a special procedure whereby the Court of Justice (and the Court of First Instance?) could request an interpretation of the ECHR from the European Court of Human Rights?

75. Consideration could be given to the question of whether it would be advisable, in addition to the operation of the ECHR complaints system (the contentious jurisdiction of the Court), to introduce a special procedure under which the ECJ (and possibly the Court of First Instance) would be authorised to request an interpretation of the ECHR from the European Court of Human Rights. This idea is further elaborated in document DGII(2001)02, paragraph 2.b. Introduction of such a procedure would obviously require amendments to the Convention, for example to Article 47, the wording of which would depend on the precise modalities retained.

76. The main argument in favour of this would be that it would assist in avoiding divergences in case-law. Another advantage could be that it might lead to a lower number of individual applications.

77. On the other hand, it must be pointed out, however, that this idea presents a number of disadvantages, such as:

- (i) It would create an imbalance between the EC/EU and the other Contracting parties to the Convention, the supreme courts of which are not able to benefit from a system of references.

<sup>14</sup> Within the limits, of course, of the rules of the Convention itself: e.g. Article 27, paragraph 2, ECHR provides that the judge elected in respect of the State Party concerned shall sit as an ex officio member of the Chamber and the Grand Chamber. The same would apply with regard to the judge elected in respect of the EC/EU concerning the consideration of cases brought against the EC/EU.

- (ii) Although time-limits may be laid down, it would lead to a prolongation of the procedures before the Luxembourg Court. This would be particularly awkward in the case of successive preliminary reference procedures.
- (iii) If time-limits were laid down it may adversely affect the treatment of other cases before the ECHR.

i) CHAPTER III – OTHER MEANS TO AVOID ANY CONTRADICTION BETWEEN THE LEGAL SYSTEM OF
THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES/UNION AND THE SYSTEM OF THE EUROPEAN CONVENTION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

78. The terms of reference of the CDDH require it to study not only issues relating to a possible accession by the EC/EU to the ECHR but also “other means to avoid any contradiction between the legal system of the European Communities/union and the system of the European Convention on Human Rights.”

79. During the examination of this question, the suggestion was made that one “other means” could consist of maintaining the status quo, i.e.: a situation where the main legally binding human rights instrument in Europe was the ECHR, where this instrument and the Court’s case-law were also applied by the Luxembourg Court as general principles of Community Law, with only a small number of cases so far raising the issue of possible contradictions between the case-law of the Strasbourg and Luxembourg Courts. The consistency of the case-law is not accidental and is the result notably of the obligation of Article 6 of the Treaty on the European Union.

80. As was also noted by President Rodríguez Iglesias of the Court of Justice of the European Communities in his Strasbourg speech on 31 January 2002, it must be recognised that that situation could change considerably if the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights were to become legally binding<sup>15</sup>. Indeed, in the view of the CDDH, experience tends to show that it is difficult to avoid contradictions where two differently worded texts on the same subject-matter are interpreted by two different courts. The provisions of Articles 52 and 53 of the EU Charter will probably not be sufficient to avoid the risk of contradictions, certainly not where the application and interpretation of the Charter and the ECHR by national courts is concerned. However, the question of whether the EU Charter should be made legally binding or not is, of course, for the EU to decide, not for the Council of Europe. More generally, the point was made that the risk of contradictions might arise independently of whether the EU Charter becomes binding or not.

<sup>15</sup> Both this speech and that of President Wildhaber of the European Court of Human Rights are reproduced in document GT-DH-EU(2002)11 and published on the Court’s website (www.echr.coe.int).

81. Two potential further means to avoid contradictions were noted, other than accession by the EC/EU to the ECHR. The first was the introduction of a preliminary rulings-procedure whereby the Luxembourg Court could seek a ruling from the Strasbourg Court on the interpretation of the ECHR. Attention was drawn to the question of whether such a ruling by the Strasbourg Court could or should be binding upon the Luxembourg Court, if the EC/EU itself is not a Party to the ECHR. Reference is also made, mutatis mutandis, to Chapter II, point C.2. above, where the idea is further discussed, albeit in the context of accession<sup>16</sup>.

82. The last idea mentioned was that of setting up a common chamber or “panel” between the Luxembourg and Strasbourg Courts, along the lines of the joint panel that exists between the highest federal courts in Germany. That joint panel decides if one of the highest federal courts intends to adopt an interpretation of the law which diverges from the interpretation adopted by another of the highest federal courts.

---

<sup>16</sup> The CDDH also recalls that the Reflection Group on the reinforcement of the Human Rights Protection Mechanism set up by the CDDH in 2001 had decided not to retain the idea of establishing a system of preliminary rulings, because it would imply additional work for the Court and possibly interfere with the contentious jurisdiction of the Court (see document CDDH-GDR(2001)10, Appendix II, paragraph 31).

- concerning the Convention :

a) The terms “State”, “State Party” or “States” contained in Article 10, paragraph 1, Article 11, paragraph 2, Article 17, Article 27, paragraphs 2 and 3, Article 38, paragraph 1.a, Article 56, paragraphs 1 and 4, Article 57, paragraph 1, shall be understood as referring to “a High Contracting Party” or “High Contracting Parties”, respectively.

b) The term “ratification” in Articles 56, paragraph 1 and 57 paragraph 1 of the Convention shall be understood as referring also to “accession”.

c) The terms “national security”, “economic well-being of the country”, “territorial integrity”, “national laws” contained in Articles 8, 10, 11 and Article 12 of the Convention and the term “nation” contained in Article 15, paragraph 1, of the Convention shall apply mutatis mutandis to the (European Communities) (European Union).

d) Article 35bis: (Possible new provision to be inserted between Articles 35 and 36 ECHR):

In cases before a Chamber or the Grand Chamber against a member State of the (European Communities) (European Union) which appear to raise an issue involving (Community) (Union) law, the (European Communities) (European Union) may, with the leave of the Court, be joined to the proceedings as a defendant.

2. In cases before a Chamber or the Grand Chamber against the (European Communities) (European Union), any member State of the latter may, with the leave of the Court, be joined to the proceedings as a defendant.

3. In the event of application of paragraphs 1 or 2 above, Article 27, paragraphs 2 and 3, shall apply accordingly.”

Comments

- It is stressed that this text is just one example of how the idea of a “co-Defendant” status could be introduced in the ECHR system. Other drafting examples could also be elaborated (eg. merging paragraphs 1 and 2 above; or qualifying paragraph 2 above by specifying that, in cases “which appear to raise an issue involving the implementation of (Community) (Union) law by a member State of the (European Communities) (European Union), that member State may, with the leave of the Court....” etc.)

- In the Rules of the Court, more detailed rules could be laid down, for example concerning the communication of cases to Contracting Parties having the possibility to join the proceedings by virtue of Article 35bis, paragraph 1 or 2, and the fixing of a time-limit (eg: three months) for seeking leave to do so.

- concerning the Protocols :

a) The terms “State”, “States” or “States Parties” contained in Articles 1 and 2 of Protocol No. 1, Articles 3 and 5 (paragraphs 4 and 5) of Protocol No. 4, Articles 5 (paragraph 2) and 6 of Protocol No. 6, Articles 3, 4 (paragraphs 1 and 2), 5, 6 (paragraphs 2, 5 and 6) and 7 of Protocol No. 7, Articles 2 (paragraphs 2 and 5) and 3 of Protocol No. 12 as well as Articles 4 (paragraphs 1) and 5 of Protocol No. 13, shall be understood as referring to “a High Contracting Party” or “High Contracting Parties”, respectively.<sup>21</sup>

b) The term “ratification” in Article 4 (paragraph 1) of Protocol No. 1, Article 5 (paragraphs 1 and 4) of Protocol No. 4, Article 5 (paragraph 1) of Protocol No. 6, Article 6 (paragraphs 1 and 5) of Protocol No. 7, Article 2 (paragraph 1) of Protocol No. 12 and Article 4 (paragraph 1) of Protocol No. 13 shall be understood as referring also to “accession”.

<sup>21</sup> In addition, Protocol No. 6, Article 2 (death penalty in time of war) only refers to States. While it is possible to include a reference to this provision in the present interpretative clause, it may be neither necessary nor politically advisable to do so.

c) The terms “territory of a/the State” and “national security”, contained in Articles 2 (paragraphs 1 and 3) and 3 (paragraphs 1 and 2) of Protocol No. 4 as well as Article 1 (paragraphs 1 and 2) of Protocol No. 7 shall apply mutatis mutandis to the (European Communities) (European Union).

- Legal basis for the financial participation of the EC/EU

A draft provision to be included in an amending protocol to the Convention or in an accession agreement/treaty could read as follows:

“The conditions of the financial participation by the (European Communities) (European Union) shall be determined by agreement between the Council of Europe and the (European Communities) (European Union).”

IV. TECHNICAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE QUESTIONS

Any more detailed rules concerning the conditions for the financial participation of the EC/EU could be set out either in this chapter or in a separate agreement.

As concerns the ancillary treaties, see under VI below.

V. ENTRY INTO FORCE OF THE AMENDING PROTOCOL / ACCESSION TREATY

Traditional clauses:

“Article X

- 1 This Protocol/[Treaty]<sup>22</sup> shall be open for signature by member States of the Council of Europe signatories to the Convention [and the (European Communities) (European Union)], which may express their consent to be bound by

- a signature without reservation as to ratification, acceptance or approval; or
  - b signature subject to ratification, acceptance or approval, followed by ratification, acceptance or approval.
- 2 The instruments of ratification, acceptance or approval shall be deposited with the Secretary General of the Council of Europe. »

« Article Y

This Protocol/[Treaty] shall enter into force on the first day of the month following the expiration of a period of six months<sup>23</sup> after the date on which all Parties to the Convention [and the (European Communities) (European Union)] have expressed their consent to be bound by the Protocol/[Treaty] in accordance with the provisions of Article X.”

Possible tacit acceptance clause for an amending protocol:

“1 This Protocol shall enter into force on the first day of the month following the date on which the last of the Parties to the Convention has deposited its instrument of acceptance with the Secretary General of the Council of Europe.

2 However, this Protocol shall enter into force following the expiry of a period of two years after the date on which it has been opened to acceptance, unless a Party to the Convention has notified the Secretary General of the Council of Europe of an objection to its entry into force.

3 Should such an objection be notified, the Protocol shall enter into force on the first day of the month following the date on which the Party to the Convention which has notified the objection has deposited its instrument of acceptance with the Secretary General of the Council of Europe. Any objection shall be without prejudice to the other Parties’ tacit acceptance in accordance with the preceding paragraph.”

<sup>23</sup> To provide time for the election of a judge.

VI. ACCOMODATIONS IN RESPECT OF ANCILLARY AGREEMENTS

Option 1: A clause to be included in the accession treaty to the effect that:

“The (European Communities) (European Union) shall respect the substantive provisions of the European Agreement relating to Persons Participating in Proceedings of the European Court of Human Rights and the Sixth Protocol to the General Agreement on Privileges and Immunities of the Council of Europe.”

Option 2: Introducing a series of technical amendments to the European Agreement relating to Persons Participating in Proceedings of the European Court of Human Rights and the Sixth Protocol to the General Agreement on Privileges and Immunities, similar to the amendments to the protocols to the ECHR, by two separate amending protocols (see Part II of this Appendix above).

ANNEXE

Provisional edition

Future of the co-operation between European institutions

Resolution 1290 (2002)<sup>1</sup>

1. Europe is reaching an important point of its evolution. The perspective enlargement of the European Union presents it with a formidable challenge. The Convention set up by the Laeken Summit will pave the way for institutional reform and a constitutional framework. Its outcome will have consequences for all the institutions of Europe, including the Council of Europe.
2. The Council of Europe, as the most longstanding and comprehensive of the continent's institutions, needs to re-confirm its unique position among them, based upon its principal assets : the European Convention on Human Rights and the European Court at Strasbourg. These, together with its experience of striving to secure the highest standards of democracy and the rule of law, should be the basis for new forms of co-operation with the enlarging European Union.
3. The Assembly recalls the outstanding achievements of the Council of Europe in the pursuance of its statutory aim to achieve greater unity between its members for the purpose of safeguarding and realising the ideals of pluralist democracy, human rights and the rule of law.
4. The Assembly recalls that the Council of Europe and the European Union share the same values and pursue common aims with regard to the protection of democracy, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and the rule of law.

Rés. 1290

5. The Assembly recalls that co-operation between the European Union and the Council of Europe is expressly mentioned in several provisions of the EC Treaty (Articles 149 § 3, 151 § 3 and 303).
6. The Assembly recalls in particular Article 303 of the EC Treaty which stipulates that “the Community shall establish all appropriate forms of co-operation with the Council of Europe”.
7. The Assembly recalls that the European Council in Dublin (December 1996) recognised the Council of Europe’s crucial role in upholding human rights standards and supporting pluralist democracy.
8. The Assembly is convinced that co-operation between the Council of Europe and the European Union should be extended to all areas where it brings added value to both sides and strengthens complementarity of action.
9. The Parliamentary Assembly has always been at the forefront of reflection on new European political projects and on the role the Council of Europe should play in it. In January 1999, it adopted Resolution 1177 on Building greater Europe without dividing lines, Resolution 1178 on European political project and Recommendation 1394 on Europe: a continental design, as part of the follow-up to the 2nd Summit of Heads of State and Government, and the ensuing report of the Committee of Wise Persons on the role of the Council of Europe.
10. The European Union Convention is an opportunity to reinforce legally binding mechanisms for the protection of human rights within the European Union. The objective of strengthening the safeguard of these rights both within the European Union and in Europe as a whole, can only be achieved through the accession of the European Union/European Community to the European Convention of Human Rights, which would create a single legal mechanism applying in equal manner to all state and other authorities in Europe which are exercising the competence affecting the rights protected by the Convention.
11. The European Union and the Council of Europe represent two distinct, but mutually reinforcing approaches to the achievement of ever greater unity among European States. The Council of Europe, with its pan-European membership, its experience and achievements in the field of human rights, democratic institutions, the rule of law, protection of minorities and local and regional authorities offers a privileged platform for dialogue and co-operation, both at parliamentary and inter-governmental levels, between all European States, be they members or non-members of the European Union, and the European Union itself.
12. The Council of Europe’s acquis in standard setting activities in the fields of democracy, the rule of law and fundamental human rights and freedoms should be considered as milestones towards the great European political project, and the European Court of Human Rights should be recognised as the pre-eminent judicial pillar of any future architecture.
13. Recently, the Council of Europe has shown that it is able to respond to the threat of terrorism at European and global level, by sharing, promoting and protecting democratic values and cross-cultural understanding. The Council of Europe has the necessary composition and the tools to be an active player in this area and to implement adequate programmes. It is an excellent platform for inter-cultural and inter-religious dialogue.

Rés. 1290

14. The Council of Europe has great experience in co-operating with the OSCE at governmental and parliamentary levels, including field operations and the observation of elections. This asset should be used for redefining their co-operation in the new European institutional architecture.

15. All pan-European and sub-regional institutions should complement each other in their mutual aim to build a democratic, stable, peaceful and prosperous Europe and co-operate effectively.

16. The Assembly calls upon the European Union and on the applicant states:

a. to consider the Council of Europe as an active partner in the European Union's pre-accession strategy, through its wide spectrum of legal arsenal for democratic governance, protection of human rights and minorities and in particular by making full use of the Council of Europe's increasingly effective monitoring procedure as regards the obligations and commitments entered into by member states;

b. to profit from the experience gained by the members of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, as the only truly pan-European inter-parliamentary assembly, where soon every European national parliament will be represented, in the work of the Conference of European Affairs Committees of the Parliaments of the European Union and Candidate Countries (COSAC).

17. The Assembly calls upon the European Union/European Community to accede to the European Convention on Human Rights, and thus contribute to the creation of a single legal mechanism for the protection of human rights, applied on equal basis to all European States and other bodies exercising competence affecting the rights protected by the Convention.

18. The Assembly invites the European Union to strengthen its presence in the Council of Europe through the participation of the European Commission in the Committee of Ministers, and the European Parliament in the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe.

19. For this purpose the Assembly calls upon the Convention to ensure that the European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights is designed to complement and enhance the effectiveness of the European Convention on Human Rights.

20. The Assembly considers that the Council of Europe's conventions, which member states are obliged or encouraged to ratify, provide a legal framework for the entire continent of Europe defining standards on human dignity and democracy, social cohesion, cultural identity, daily life and media. They can be enhanced by additional Protocols, and implemented into national law. The Assembly calls upon the Convention to encourage this process rather than undermining it by the introduction of a separate legal framework for the European Union.

21. The Assembly calls upon the institutions of the European Union to examine possibilities for increased participation in the Council of Europe's work, in all relevant areas and at all appropriate institutional levels and enhance financial co-operation with the Council of Europe.

22. The Assembly calls upon the European Union Commission to study carefully the steps that would lead to the development of a coherent European legal order by incorporating the main Council of Europe's standard setting instruments into the European Union legal system, or inversely by acceding to major Council of Europe legal instruments.

Rés. 1290

23. The Assembly calls upon the European Parliament to continue and improve co-operation with the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, at different levels (Political groups, bureaux, committees), based on the recognition of common values and interests, in an effective and pragmatic manner. The creation of a joint committee is essential as well as the active participation of the European Parliament in the PACE. Institutional co-operation can be improved by co-operation at the level of monitoring procedures, having regard to the good results of the Monitoring Committee of the PACE, by organising together seminars and fact-finding missions and by co-operating in the field of the observing of elections. The PACE and the European Parliament stand for the same European values including a common rule of law avoiding double standards.

24. The Assembly calls upon the Secretary General of the Council of Europe to follow closely the work of the Convention set up at the Laeken Summit, evaluate its potential impact on the work of the Council of Europe, present the accomplishments of the Council of Europe to the Convention in the most appropriate way, especially in areas where the need might arise, and keep the Parliamentary Assembly regularly informed about the progress of work.

25. The Assembly calls upon the Convention to be aware that the Council of Europe is the institution allowing those States which will remain outside the European Union to participate in the European project, thus avoiding the creation of new dividing lines and a sense of exclusion among the non European Union member states of the Council of Europe.

26. The Assembly urges the Convention to avoid the introduction of any duplication or parallel activities by European Union which would undermine the work of the Congress of Local and Regional Authorities (CLRAE) as the only pan-European body for promoting local democracy structures and transfrontier co-operation.

27. The Assembly calls upon member states of the Council of Europe to fully take into account the Organisation's acquis in standard-setting in the fields of democracy, the rule of law and fundamental human rights and freedoms, as well as its political assets, when planning activities of European institutions in which they take part, in order to avoid overlaps and achieve maximum efficiency in building Europe of the future.

Future of the co-operation between European institutions

Report

Political Affairs Committee

Rapporteur: Mr René van der Linden, Netherlands, Group of the European People's Party

Summary:

The prospect of enlargement presents the European Union with a formidable challenge. The Convention set up by the Laeken Summit will pave the way for institutional reform and a new constitutional framework. Looking ahead to this major development, the Council of Europe must reiterate its unique position, based on its principal assets: the European Convention on Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights. The Council must also stress its unparalleled experience in the field of human rights, the rule of law and upholding democracy. Finally, it must consolidate its role as a pan-European organisation offering a privileged platform for dialogue and co-operation, both at parliamentary and inter-governmental levels, between all European States, be they members or non-members of the European Union.

The Assembly asks the European Union and the candidate countries to consider the Council of Europe as an active partner in the European Union's pre-accession strategy and to profit from the experience gained by the members of the Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly. Among a number of recommendations, the Assembly calls on the European Union to accede to the European Convention on Human Rights, and thus contribute to the creation of a single legal mechanism for human rights protection. It also urges the European Commission to accede to the main Council of Europe legal instruments or incorporate them into the European Union legal system.

I. Draft Resolution

2. Europe is reaching an important point of its evolution. The perspective enlargement of the European Union presents it with a formidable challenge. The Convention set up by the Laeken Summit will pave the way for institutional reform and a constitutional framework. Its outcome will have consequences for all the institutions of Europe, including the Council of Europe.

2. The Council of Europe, as the most longstanding and comprehensive of the continent's institutions, needs to re-confirm its unique position among them, based upon its principal assets : the European Convention on Human Rights and the European Court at Strasbourg. These, together with its experience of striving to secure the highest standards of democracy and the rule of law, should be the basis for new forms of co-operation with the enlarging European Union.

3. The Parliamentary Assembly has always been at the forefront of reflection on new European political projects and on the role the Council of Europe should play in it. In January 1999, it adopted Resolution 1177 on Building greater Europe without dividing lines, Resolution 1178 on European political project and Recommendation 1394 on Europe: a continental design, as part of the follow-up to the 2nd Summit of Heads of State and Government, and the ensuing report of the Committee of Wise Persons on the role of the Council of Europe.

4. The European Union Convention is an opportunity to reinforce legally binding mechanisms for the protection of human rights within the European Union. The objective of strengthening the safeguard of these rights both within the European Union and in Europe as a whole, can only be achieved through the accession of the European Union/European Community to the European Convention of Human Rights, which would create a single legal mechanism applying in equal manner to all state and other authorities in Europe which are exercising the competence affecting the rights protected by the Convention.

5. The European Union and the Council of Europe represent two distinct, but mutually reinforcing approaches to the achievement of ever greater unity among European States. The Council of Europe, with its pan-European membership, its experience and achievements in the field of human rights, democratic institutions, the rule of law, protection of minorities and local and regional authorities offers a privileged platform for dialogue and co-operation, both at parliamentary and inter-governmental levels, between all European States, be they members or non-members of the European Union, and the European Union itself.

6. The Council of Europe's acquis in standard setting activities in the fields of democracy, the rule of law and fundamental human rights and freedoms should be considered as milestones towards the great European political project, and the European Court of Human Rights should be recognised as the pre-eminent judicial pillar of any future architecture.

7. Recently, the Council of Europe has shown that it is able to respond to the threat of terrorism at European and global level, by sharing, promoting and protecting democratic values and cross-cultural understanding. The Council of Europe has the necessary composition and the tools to be an active player in this area and to implement adequate programmes. It is an excellent platform for inter-cultural and inter-religious dialogue.

8. The Council of Europe has great experience in cooperating with the OSCE at governmental and parliamentary levels, including field operations and the observation of elections. This asset should be used for redefining their cooperation in the new European institutional architecture.

Doc. 9483

9. All pan-European and sub-regional institutions should complement each other in their mutual aim to build a democratic, stable, peaceful and prosperous Europe and cooperate effectively.
10. The Assembly calls upon the European Union and on the applicant States:
- a. to consider the Council of Europe as an active partner in the European Union's pre-accession strategy, through its wide spectrum of legal arsenal for democratic governance, protection of human rights and minorities and in particular by making full use of the Council of Europe's increasingly effective monitoring procedure as regards the obligations and commitments entered into by member States;
  - b. to profit from the experience gained by the members of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, as the only truly pan-European inter-parliamentary assembly, where soon every European national parliament will be represented, in the work of the Conference of European Affairs Committees of the Parliaments of the European Union and Candidate Countries (COSAC);
11. The Assembly calls upon the European Union / European Community to accede to the European Convention on Human Rights, and thus contribute to the creation of a single legal mechanism for the protection of human rights, applied on equal basis to all European States and other bodies exercising competence affecting the rights protected by the Convention;
12. For this purpose the Assembly calls upon the Convention to ensure that the European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights is designed to complement and enhance the effectiveness of the European Convention on Human Rights.
13. The Assembly considers that the Council of Europe's conventions, which member States are obliged or encouraged to ratify, provide a legal framework for the entire continent of Europe defining standards on human dignity and democracy, social cohesion, cultural identity, daily life and media. They can be enhanced by additional Protocols, and implemented into national law. The Assembly calls upon the Convention to encourage this process rather than undermining it by the introduction of a separate legal framework for the European Union.
14. The Assembly calls upon the institutions of the European Union to examine possibilities for increased participation in the Council of Europe's work, in all relevant areas and at all appropriate institutional levels and enhance financial cooperation with the Council of Europe;
15. The Assembly calls upon the European Union Commission to study carefully the steps that would lead to the development of a coherent European legal order by incorporating the main Council of Europe's standard setting instruments into the European Union legal system, or inversely by acceding to major Council of Europe legal instruments;
16. The Assembly calls upon the European Parliament to continue and improve co-operation with the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, at different levels (Political groups, bureaux, committees), based on the recognition of common values and interests, in an effective and pragmatic manner. The creation of a joint committee must be considered as well as the active participation of the European Parliament in the PACE;
17. The Assembly calls upon the Secretary General of the Council of Europe to follow closely the work of the Convention set up at the Laeken Summit, evaluate its potential impact on the work of the Council of Europe, present the accomplishments of the Council of Europe to the Convention in the most appropriate way, especially in areas where the need might arise, and keep the Parliamentary Assembly regularly informed about the progress of work;

18. The Assembly calls upon the Convention to be aware that the Council of Europe is the institution allowing those States which will remain outside the European Union to participate in the European project, thus avoiding the creation of new dividing lines and a sense of exclusion among the non European Union member States of the Council of Europe.

19. The Assembly urges the Convention to avoid the introduction of any duplication or parallel activities by European Union which would undermine the work of the Congress of Local and Regional Authorities (CLRAE) as the only pan-European body for promoting local democracy structures and transfrontier co-operation.

20. The Assembly calls upon member States of the Council of Europe to fully take into account the Organisation's acquis in standard-setting in the fields of democracy, the rule of law and fundamental human rights and freedoms, as well as its political assets, when planning activities of European institutions in which they take part, in order to avoid overlaps and achieve maximum efficiency in building Europe of the future.

II. Draft Recommendation

The Assembly refers to its Resolution ....(2002) on future co-operation between European institutions, and recommends to the Committee of Ministers to convene a third summit of heads of States and governments, at a moment carefully timed before the inter-governmental conference of the European Union, with a view to giving new political impetus at the highest level to the Organisation, to better taking into account the political needs of its member States and to redefining its relations with other European institutions.

III. Explanatory memorandum by the Rapporteur

I. Introduction

1. Once again, in 2001, universal values of human rights, the rule of law and democracy have been challenged - showing the need, at European and at global levels, for expressing, sharing, promoting and protecting common values as well as for strengthening a fair and sustainable multicultural and inter-religious dialogue.

2. I strongly support the Council of Europe's Secretary General, Mr Walter Schwimmer, when he reaffirms that "the year 2001 and the date 11 September will remain engraved in our memories. The terrorist attacks could have weakened our convictions. But on the contrary, they have strengthened the Council of Europe universal values of human rights, the rule of law and democracy".

3. In the Assembly of the Council of Europe, democratically chosen representatives from 43 countries work together. They offer an essential contribution to the democratic evolution in Eastern Europe and its transition process. Even after the extension of the European Union almost half the European States will continue to co-operate within the framework of the Council of Europe and outside that of the European Union. Some of them will, by choice, limit their membership of a community of democratic States to that of the Council of Europe.

4. Once again, after 2001, the European institutional landscape is at an important juncture. For instance, the perspective of enlargement presents a formidable challenge to the European Union (EU), and its structural framework is at present under serious scrutiny. No doubt, other organisations, with a potential or consolidated pan-European vocation, such as the Council of Europe, will be affected by this change and it is therefore not surprising to indulge in a soul-searching exercise.

5. The Council of Europe should become the conscience of Europe in the field of human rights, minority rights and democratic functioning. In that sense the Council of Europe must take, consequently and explicitly, real political points of view. More political and less diplomatic action is needed. The Council of Europe should even further develop its control and monitoring mechanisms to guarantee the efficiency of its standard-setting instruments. They should produce better political guidelines for their member States, guidelines which should be more easily enforceable under national legislation.

6. The members of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe are in an unique position and have, in fact, a double mandate. Therefore, the members of the Parliamentary Assembly should more intensively inform the national parliaments about the political issues which are being treated in the Council of Europe. The Council of Europe, as an intergovernmental body, is too hesitant when defending its own position. Here again, it is up to the Parliamentary Assembly to do more and to bring their political conclusions to their own parliaments and to organise in their own parliaments debates on the national and regional consequences of the Council of Europe's decisions. Accompanied by a more effective organisation of the press and public relations this could make quite a difference already.

7. The Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe is at the forefront of the reflection on the European institutional architecture and on the role of the Council of Europe should play in it. In recent years, it contributed substantially to the two Council of Europe Summits of Heads of State and Government, held in 1993 and 1997, analysed meticulously the 1998 report of the Committee of Wise Persons, and adopted in January 1999 a series of texts, which respectively called for a pre-eminent role for the Council of Europe (Recommendation 1394 (99)<sup>1</sup>), stressed the importance of the parliamentary dimension (Resolution 1178 (99)<sup>2</sup>) and proposed a clear definition of the Council of Europe's priorities (Resolution 1177 (99)<sup>3</sup>).

8. In January 2000, a group of parliamentarians tabled a motion on the 'European Architecture on the 21st Century' (Doc. 8639) with the aim of pursuing and deepening this previously engaged discussion. Their motivation was twofold:

- a. at the turn of the 21st century it is unlikely that so many pan-European organisations, with sometimes similar or overlapping activities, will continue to function unchanged;
- b. if fewer and different organisations are to occupy the scene, the Council of Europe ought to take "a lead in forging its own image, based on its own values"; otherwise the solution would be imposed upon it by others.

9. Without necessarily sharing the defeatist approach contained in this last sentence, one must however thank the authors of the document for generating a renewed reflection, in particular in view of the forthcoming inter-governmental conference of the EU and the beginning of the enlargement process, which is on the way.

10. I believe, however, that the Council of Europe is not only a "waiting room" for the EU. On the contrary, since the existence of the "Copenhagen criteria" for the future EU members, the Council of Europe is an active partner in the Union's pre-accession strategy. Indeed, through its wide spectrum of legal arsenal for the protection of human rights, minorities, democratic governance and social peace, the Organisation plays a key role in consolidating democratic institutions in member States and consequently is a pillar of the European construction. This role, however, could be further emphasised and promoted through political will and energetic measures.

11. When speaking about the European institutional structure our aim is not to interfere with the domestic affairs of the EU, nor to make a judgement on their policy choices. The core of the discussion this paper aims to trigger is the positioning of the Council of Europe vis-à-vis the EU and other political institutions, such as the OSCE. In doing so, we will unavoidably touch upon questions of general interest for the whole of Europe or for a group of member States. The future of relations with other organisations has also close links with the Council of Europe's own structures and Parliamentary Assembly's own activities. The aims of the OSCE are, in general terms, in harmony with the aims of the Council of Europe. The difference is that the OSCE has no formal legal structure, but perhaps it uses its political position better. One reason for this is the interest of the United States in the OSCE. The OSCE is one of the organisations which offers the United States a position of influence in Europe. It should certainly be regretted, in this context, that the US did not make, up to now, appropriate use of their observer status with the Council of Europe.

II. The idea of concentric circles

12. Considering that membership of the EU, the Council of Europe and the OSCE can be expressed in terms of concentric circles, one could imagine that co-operation could be organised in the same way, the inner circle representing the highest level of integration to which member States aspire.

13. An accurate assessment of different scenarios of co-operation implies a realistic review of the present situation. However, before making any proposals or suggesting new possibilities, it is good to see what is realistic to expect or unlikely to achieve. If high expectations are an acceptable starting point, they must nonetheless be kept under controllable and feasible limits.

14. In this respect, during the drawing-up of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU, though the arguments presented by the Assembly were absolutely right at that time, it was obvious for political reasons that the idea of asking the EU to limit itself to signing the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) was doomed as the EU leadership was resolutely committed to giving a human and social rights dimension to the European Union. But it must be stressed that this respectable commitment does in no way question or even call off the request of the Parliamentary Assembly to the EU to adhere to the ECHR.

15. Likewise, comments have been voiced lately that the OSCE has been extending its field of activities to include questions related to human rights and fundamental freedoms, thus encroaching on the Council of Europe's territory. It should be recalled that the OSCE is an offspring of the Helsinki Conference and the Final Act, which included a special basket on human rights. This latter therefore has been an important aspect of its work from the very beginning of its existence and will probably continue to be so.

16. Accordingly, we should on one hand acknowledge the fact that no European organisation can ignore the human rights dimension in its activities and development. On the other hand, we should acknowledge the high degree of experience and expertise which the Council of Europe possesses in this area. It is unanimously recognised that the Council of Europe is the standard setting organisation for human rights in Europe.

17. As regards the idea of a European constitution, one should recall that it is not alien to our Organisation. Already in 1950, when signing the European Convention on Human Rights on behalf of the Federal Republic of Germany, Professor Walter Hallstein stated that one day "... an agreement on what comprises human rights and fundamental freedoms may even be the basis for a European Constitution". In the late '90s, the then existing Committee on Relations with National Parliaments had commissioned a study to be carried out by Professor Rausseau on a 'European Constitution'.

18. Very recently, the 'Convention' set up at the Laeken Summit, under the chairmanship of Mr Giscard d'Estaing has started its work and it is highly probable that it will pave the way for institutional reform and a constitution for the EU. With its long experience, the Council of Europe should follow this work very closely. The Council of Europe was not granted a status of observer. However, it could still make a valuable contribution through a number of members of the Parliamentary Assembly who will be sitting in their national delegations to the convention. One could also envisage special co-ordination meetings amongst them. Moreover, ways should be found to enable the Council of Europe to make contributions to the Convention, in particular with regard to fundamental rights, including the co-operation between the Strasbourg and Luxembourg courts, as well as the crucial question of future relations between the Council of Europe and an enlarged EU.

19. Concerning our own Organisation, when making proposals in this field, the Parliamentary Assembly must analyse accurately the reaction of our governments to our past positions in adopted texts. For instance, the Reply<sup>1</sup> of the Committee of Ministers to Recommendation 1394 (1999) on ‘Europe: a continental design’ is revealing on many points. While the Committee of Ministers shares the “ambition and commitment” of the Assembly in respect of European construction “it is aware...that the rediscovered unity of the continent can only be sustained and developed if it is incorporated into a coherent political project in which the efforts of various organisations ...are mutually strengthened”.

20. Thus, the Committee of Ministers does not come forward with a vision, specific to the raison d’être of the Council of Europe. In addition, the Committee of Ministers declares that it “is unable to go as far as stating that the Council of Europe can be considered as “a forum capable of meeting the global challenges of the third millennium”. Instead, the Committee of Ministers “reaffirms the major importance it attaches to the complementary functions and co-ordination of efforts between the Council of Europe and its main partners in the European context”. The temptation is strong to interpret this, combined with the increasing absenteeism of Ministers at ministerial level meetings and the stagnating budget, as a way of minimising the political role of the organisation in its own right.

21. One point which is often raised in connection with co-operation between European institutions is work sharing. Here again, many serious efforts aiming at a thematic repartition of activities have failed. We should aim at organising in concrete terms the complementarity which we so often proclaim. Of course we have to take into account that membership of the EU imposes an obligation to its members to act in accordance with the treaties. As regards the Assembly’s own activities, recently co-operation has improved with the European Parliament, at Presidential and political groups level and occasional joint meetings and conferences at committee level. We should not aim at establishing rigid rules for co-operation but develop in a pragmatic way all possible communication channels and common activities.

III. What are the Council of Europe’s assets?

22. I believe that the best method is to emphasise the areas where the Council of Europe could be most effective and instrumental in “building a greater Europe without dividing lines”, as it was expressed so meaningfully in Assembly Resolution 1177 (99), rather than looking at what others are doing or by formulating disguised criticism at partner institutions. Our chances of improving the performance of the Council of Europe, which is already remarkable, are much better than undertaking some global rationalisation and co-ordination scheme. This does, of course, not mean that we should not pursue the dialogue with our partner organisations with whom we share common values and conduct common projects.

23. It is my strong conviction that the widening and deepening of the EU on one hand, and the strengthening of the Council of Europe on the other, are not at antipodes. On the contrary, the existence of the Council of Europe:

Doc. 9483

- a. alleviates the sense of exclusion which could be felt by those member States which are not ready yet for EU membership, or those who do not intend to become members;
- b. reassures applicant States that their progress towards membership of the EU is following the correct path and pace.

24. No less is the argument that in the 21st century inclusion in Europe should not be measured solely by belonging to the EU.

25. The presence of the Russian Federation in the Council of Europe is an indispensable political factor of the new European dialogue between equal and like-minded partners throughout the whole continent. The Parliamentary Assembly's flexible structures and dynamism are assets which must be used to the full. A good illustration of this is the meaningful pressure which is being put on Russia in relation to the conflict in Chechnya. Despite the Committee of Ministers' somewhat passive handling of the matter, the Council of Europe's combined action and the initiatives of the Secretary General of the Council of Europe and the Human Rights Commissioner have substantially contributed to putting in place human rights machinery in Chechnya and also the Duma / PACE Joint Working Group is instrumental in pursuing a political solution.

26. I am thoroughly convinced that the terrorist attacks of 11 September were an important turning point, which has generated, at global level, the need for sharing, promoting and protecting democratic values and cross-cultural understanding. The Council of Europe has the necessary tools to be an active player in this area and I understand, under the impetus of the Parliamentary Assembly and the Secretary General, the Committee of Ministers is prepared to launch adequate new programmes. On the Assembly side, we should also be prepared to further strengthen the dialogue with non-member countries, in particular, those Muslim countries bordering the Mediterranean. The work, since 1991, of the Council of Europe's Centre for Global Interdependence and Solidarity, the "North-South Centre" in Lisbon, should be valued and highlighted in this context.

27. Several countries enjoy Observer Status with the Council of Europe and several parliaments with the Parliamentary Assembly, and others would be interested in obtaining this status, which, no doubt, permits the intensification of political dialogue: however, the recent adoption by the Parliamentary Assembly of Resolution 1253 (2001), Recommendation 1522 (2001) and Order 574 (2001) on the "Abolition of the death penalty in Council of Europe Observer States" has clearly established the limits for granting such status.

28. Beside the organs of the Council of Europe, the Committee of Ministers and the Parliamentary Assembly, the European Court of Human Rights set up under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR) is one of the major assets of our Organisation. The international enforcement mechanism established in the ECHR allows to everyone within the vicinity of a member State to enjoy a level of protection of the fundamental rights and freedoms unique in the whole world. Furthermore, the Congress of Local and Regional Authorities (CLRAE) plays its indispensable role in promoting local democracy structures and trans-frontier co-operation networks as prerequisites to stability and confidence building throughout Europe.

29. The existence of specialised bodies within the Council of Europe, such as the Council of Europe Development Bank, the office of the Commissioner for Human Rights, the European Commission for Democracy through Law, ("Venice Commission"), the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI), the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture (CPT) and the Group of States against Corruption (GRECO), all designed to promote the values of democracy, human rights, social cohesion, non-discrimination, the fight against corruption as well as racism and inhuman or degrading treatment, give added weight to the work of our Organisation.

30. As an example, the Venice Commission, through its active role in transition towards democracy in Eastern Europe, has gained international notoriety. The Assembly has excellent working relations with the Venice Commission and can consult it on legal opinion in difficult matters. Very recently, following Recommendation 1264 (01) of the Assembly on the 'Code of Good Practice in Electoral Matters', the Venice Commission set up a working group which includes representatives of the Assembly. Thus, intensified co-operation will begin in the area of election observation, which has become a major activity over the last decade.

IV. Some suggestions for future co-operation of the European institutions

31. The following is an incomplete and not exhaustive list of ideas, which ought to be discussed further, possibly reformulated and enriched by members' contributions.

- a. The Council of Europe is one of the pillars of a Europe based on the universal values of human rights, the rule of law and democracy. Its founding principles and its raison d'être are constantly being challenged. In the interest of maintaining its standards of democracy, human rights and the rule of law throughout the continent, there are assets of the Council of Europe which, whilst always open to review, should be considered as standard-setting and should be recognised in Europe's institutional architecture. These are the European Convention on Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg.
- b. The Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, similarly remains the only inter-parliamentary assembly exclusive to Europe and which will soon be representative of every European national parliament. In this respect, the Assembly is the true 'democratic dimension' of Europe. We should consider how this asset of the Council of Europe – its Parliamentary Assembly – could be applied to the enlarging European Union. For example, the Conference of European Affairs Committees of the Parliaments of EU and Candidate Countries (COSAC) could well profit from contributions by the members of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe (PACE).
- c. All European institutions are experiencing an increased need for renewal and adaptation. The political and social landscape has profoundly changed, but working methods still remain the same.

- d. All European institutions are experiencing an increased need for enhanced co-operation, based on effectiveness, mutual respect and the recognition of competencies, added values and limits. There cannot be room for overlapping, duplication of efforts or even competition. In this context, the idea of concentric circles sharing the same centre should be further developed.
- e. Co-operation must take place beyond the mere expression of common values and principles. Co-operation, networking and co-ordination between the Council of Europe and the EU and other political institutions, such as the OSCE must take place at a practical level and must be visible. Co-operation should focus on very specific projects responding to specific needs of a member State or a group of member States.
- f. Another Council of Europe asset is the comparatively recent and increasingly effective procedure for monitoring the obligations and commitments entered into by new member States upon accession. The detailed scrutiny by the Parliamentary Assembly, the Committee of Ministers and the CLRAE of their progress to meet Council of Europe standards of democracy, respect of human rights and the rule of law represents an invaluable source of information and reference on the countries concerned. This large monitoring practice by the Council of Europe is, of course, shared by the fifteen EU member States and used by the EP, the EU Council and the EU Commission in their assessment of developments in candidate States. It would be gratifying for the Council of Europe, and instructive for public opinion, if this “political complementarity” would be officially recognised.
- g. The Council of Europe has recently gained very valuable field experience. It is certainly good food for thought that there exists good practice between the aforementioned organisations when it comes to concrete work, in particular in conflict areas.
- h. A proposal for a Third Summit of Heads of States and Governments is under consideration in the Committee of Ministers. The Assembly which initiated the First Summit in Vienna (1993) and strongly supported the Second Summit in Strasbourg (1997) should also support this proposal. A Third Summit would be very timely in 2003 as the Organisation will be finalising its enlargement. The Summit would give new political impetus at the highest level for the future of the Organisation.

THE EUROPEAN CONVENTION

Brussels, 18 July 2002

THE SECRETARIAT

Working Group II

Working document 09

Working group II " Incorporation of the Charter/accession to the ECHR"*From: António Vitorino, President*To: Working Group II

---

Subject : Possible drafting adjustments of Article 51 (2) and of Article 52 (2) Charter;
the question of "replication" in the Charter

I. Possible drafting adjustment of Article 51 (2) of the Charter

1. Following a request made by members of the Group at the meeting of 12 July, a possible wording of the drafting adjustment in Article 51 § 2 of the Charter, as envisaged by the Group in the hypothesis of incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties according to option f), could for example read as follows:

"This Charter [or: this Title / Chapter]<sup>1</sup> does not establish any new power or task for the Community or the Union, or modify powers and tasks defined by other provisions of the present Treaty or by the Treaty on the European Union or the Treaty establishing the European Community."

2. It should be noted that the question of such a drafting adjustment would arise only in the hypothesis of option f) (i.e., insertion of the body of the Charter articles into a new basic Treaty or into the Treaty on the European Union). Conversely, under options a) to e), the Charter would technically remain a separate instrument apart from "the Treaties" (although,

<sup>1</sup> If the possible new Title or Chapter of the TEU or a new basic Treaty containing the articles of the Charter were to receive the heading "The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union", it would then appear possible to maintain the reference to "this Charter" in the general provisions of the Charter; in the alternative, one could refer to "this Title" or "this Chapter".

under some of these options, it would have legal rank equal to the Treaties); consequently, there would be no ambiguity as to the meaning of the referral in current Article 51 § 2 from the Charter to the Treaties.

3. Furthermore, it should be kept in mind that the concrete drafting adjustment to be made would obviously depend on the decision on the legal personality and on the Treaty structure envisaged by the Convention. Thus:
  - In the event of the creation of one simple legal personality of the Union, the words "for the Community or" could be deleted.
  - In the event that the Convention opted for incorporation of the articles of the Charter into the Treaty on the European Union, rather than for a new basic Treaty, the words "the Treaty on the European Union" would be deleted since the term "the present Treaty" would refer to the TEU.
  - The reference to the "Treaty on European Union" or the "Treaty establishing the European Community" could need further adjustment in the event of the current structure and/or title of these Treaties being modified in the course of their simplification.

II. The question of "replication" in the Charter

4. As explained in section 4 of document CONV 116/02, in order to draw up a full catalogue of the fundamental rights of the Union, the Charter, in a number of its articles, simply restates rights already expressly enshrined in the EC Treaty, often, however, in the interests of readability, shortening the wording as compared with the corresponding articles of the Treaty.

These relate to rights to freedom of movement, almost all the rights in the "citizenship" chapter of the Charter (right to vote, access to documents, right of petition, etc.) and the clauses relating to non-discrimination on grounds of nationality and equality between the sexes<sup>2</sup>. Since the previous Convention had no mandate to modify the Treaties, but only to draft a Charter which could be added to them, it formulated a referral clause (Article 52(2) of the Charter<sup>3</sup>) to make it clear that, with regard to those rights, the legal situation as defined in the Treaties was unaffected by the Charter. That clause also made it possible to avoid the repetition, in each Charter article in question, of formulae to the effect that these rights are exercised under the conditions and within the limits provided for in the corresponding article of the Treaty and of secondary legislation<sup>4</sup>.

The Group should now examine more closely how this situation of "replication" of rights could be dealt with in the event of possible incorporation by the Charter into the Treaties. For purposes of such analysis, it appears appropriate to distinguish between legal aspects and in particular questions of legal certainty, on the one hand, and questions of legibility and presentation of fundamental rights, on the other hand.

5. As concerns legal aspects, and in particular concerns of legal certainty, it seems in principle that, if one of the options a) to e) were chosen, the referral clause of Article 52 § 2 of the Charter, as it stands, would clarify in a satisfactory manner that the conditions and limits for the exercise of the rights in the Charter which result from the Treaties are governed by those Treaties, and that the Charter does not alter the regime of those rights. The decisive

<sup>2</sup> Article 15 (2) Charter, corresponding to Articles 39, 43 and 49 et seq. EC Treaty (on freedom of movement for workers, freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services); Article 21(2) Charter, corresponding to Article 12 EC Treaty (on discrimination on the grounds of nationality); Article 23 Charter, corresponding to Articles 2, 3 (2) and 141 (3) and (4) EC Treaty (on equality between the sexes); Articles 39, 40, 41(3) and (4), 42 – 46 Charter, corresponding to Articles 18 to 21, 190 (1), 194, 195, 288 EC Treaty (on the rights of EU citizens).

<sup>3</sup> Article 52(2) reads as follows: "Rights recognised by this Charter which are based on the Community Treaties or the Treaty on European Union shall be exercised under the conditions and within the limits defined by those Treaties."

<sup>4</sup> On this point, see also the Explanations of the Praesidium (cited in footnote 1 on page 3) relating to this Article ("Paragraph 2 specifies that where a right results from the Treaties it is subject to the conditions and limits laid down by them. The Charter does not alter the system of rights conferred by the Treaties.") point, again, is that the Charter would technically remain a separate instrument. There would thus be no ambiguity about Article 52 (2) Charter as a clause of referral from the Charter to the Treaties; whether or not the Charter would have equal legal value as the Treaties does not matter for this purpose<sup>5</sup>.

6. Conversely, if the Convention were to prefer option f), i.e. incorporation of the Charter articles themselves into the Treaties, a need for a drafting adjustment of Article 52 (2) similarly as discussed above in the context of Article 51 (2) - would arise in order to clarify the term "Treaties". The precise wording of such a drafting adjustment would essentially depend on the future Treaty structure (which goes beyond the mandate of this Group) and on the question which place the fundamental rights currently enshrined in the EC Treaty, and in particular the citizenship rights (see below, para. 8 and 9), should find in that Treaty structure. It is therefore difficult to anticipate the correct formula at this stage. However, the Group could usefully express itself on the principle of preserving a referral clause in Article 52 (2) - albeit slightly reworded - even under that option. Some have taken the view that Article 52 (2) Charter could simply be deleted in that hypothesis. However, it seems important, in the interest of legal certainty, to keep the referral in order to make it clear that more detailed provisions to be found elsewhere in Treaty law, for example on citizenship or on freedom of movement of workers, concretise and limit those rights, and that existing case law thereon remains fully valid.
7. Turning to considerations of legibility and presentation of fundamental rights in the Treaty framework, it has been argued that the replications between articles on the same rights both in the Charter and in the Treaties could appear confusing for the citizens, and that such replications should therefore be eliminated.

<sup>5</sup> This point is demonstrated by referrals made from one article to another in the EC Treaty: For example, although Article 21 and Articles 194, 195 EC Treaty on the right to petition or to apply to the Ombudsman are of equal rank, it is clear that Article 21 EC Treaty is merely a referral and that the legal content of the right is defined by the latter Articles.

8. In this context, it should, however, first be observed that the issue appears to arise only in relation to a limited number of rights, i.e. essentially those linked to the citizenship of the Union; in other contexts such as equality between the sexes and freedom of movement for workers and the self-employed, co-existence of the very succinct Charter text and the more detailed text in the current Treaties seems perfectly appropriate and conducive to better comprehension by the citizens. As to fundamental rights flowing from EU citizenship, they were rightly included in the Charter in order to ensure their full visibility. On the other hand, the current articles on citizenship in the EC Treaty could not simply be deleted because they contain, in addition to the statement of the rights, important legal bases permitting to regulate them. These elements taken together would militate for accepting in principle the co-existence of articles on citizenship in both the Charter and the EC Treaty.

9. However, if the Convention were to favour incorporation of the body of the Articles of the Charter into a new basic Treaty (option f), it would face another question, which while going beyond the remit of this Working Group should not be ignored by it: Such a new basic Treaty would undoubtedly have to contain the most fundamental provisions on EU citizenship, including not only the citizens' rights which have been repeated in the Charter, although sometimes with shortened formulae, but also the definition of citizenship (current Article 17 EC Treaty) and perhaps a provision about its future development (current Article 22 EC Treaty). Combining these provisions with the Charter articles on citizenship going into the new Treaty pursuant to option f would require to define the respective places in that Treaty of these provisions, and thus possibly entail some complement or adjustment of the Charter chapter on Citizens' rights. Conversely, under the other options, there would then be a legally relevant chapter on citizenship in the EC Treaty or possibly in a new basic Treaty, whilst the articles "replicating" the citizens' rights in the Charter (existing as a technically separate instrument) would merely serve as a restatement enhancing the visibility of those rights.

How should the "replication" arising from the fact that some articles of the Charter repeat rights already enshrined in the EC Treaty be dealt with?

How should the “replication” arising from the fact that some articles of the Charter repeat rights already enshrined in the EC Treaty be dealt with?

The following remarks are based on the assumption that the Convention is to prefer option f), i.e. incorporation of the Charter articles themselves into the Treaties or, which seems to be more appropriate, into a new basic Treaty. The ensuing question as to the ‘fate’ of current Article 52(2) Charter is not, however, just a matter of its drafting (or technical) adjustment. The possible readjustment of the (new) Treaty around the Charter and the latter’s impact on existing Treaty rights give rise not only to the need of technical revision of the Charter’s horizontal clauses but, possibly, of existing Treaty provisions too.

Undoubtedly, purely technical amendments would be needed if one of the options a) to e) were chosen which, on the other hand, would mean that the regime of existing rights as governed by the Treaties will remain unaltered.

It is clear that Article 52(2) was intended to deal with a situation arising from the fact that the Charter, in its attempt to draw up a full catalogue of the fundamental rights of the EU, included also rights already expressly enshrined in the EC Treaty<sup>1</sup>. But it apparently has an additional implicit purpose which is in line with the purpose of Article 51(2) since the drafting of the Charter and its promulgation as a separate document presupposed its cohabitation with the existing Treaties. Thus the real (and specific) normative contents of its referral effect is actually to determine the scope of already existing rights and to ensure that the Charter, when restating such rights, does not confer “new” rights<sup>2</sup> and is not intended to extend the scope of the existing rights.

<sup>1</sup> Article 52 of the Charter as a whole serves as a general limitation clause. Its paragraph 2 has this function with respect to the rights already enshrined in the Treaties.

<sup>2</sup> In which sense the second sentence of the Explanations of the Praesidium relating to this Article (paragraph) should be read.

If the Charter is to form part of the constitutional structure of the EU, the issue of the relationship between the Charter, on the one hand, and the Treaty provisions, on the other, will arise. So far human rights provisions have existed and operated in a particular context of Community law. The future status of an incorporated Charter may have the effect of putting existing Treaty rights in a subservient position.<sup>3</sup>

If, therefore, the incorporation option leads to an alteration of the regime of existing rights, preserving Article 52(2) with a view of its legal effect (to determine the scope of certain rights) and not only of its wording is disputable

This provision may be preserved as such provided the existing system, i.e. so far the scope of the rights is concerned, is retained. In this respect the possibility of an asymmetrical situation resulting from the existence of different scope and levels of protection and separate contexts in which the norms operate must also<sup>4</sup> be explored. The consideration based on the requirement of legal certainty is an important one but it may prove not entirely valid in the light of possible evolution of case law in the event of incorporation of the Charter

Notwithstanding these considerations on the legal aspects it may be maintained that replications between articles on the same rights both in the Charter and in the Treaties are not in themselves inadmissible. And that their elimination should not, therefore, be regarded as a purpose in itself.

Finally, it would be quite in accordance with the approach employed by a number of Constitutions to have (into the "Bill of Rights" part of a new basic Treaty) a definition of EU citizenship even though that may possibly entail some complement and/or adjustment of the Charter chapter. A complement or adjustment of the Charter to that effect would not be equivalent to its revision (reopening).

<sup>3</sup> Judgements of 30 January 2002, T-54/99, and of 3 May 2002, T-177/01 seem to illustrate a tendency according to which Charter provisions prevail over Treaty provisions.

<sup>4</sup> On the other hand, the issue of "replications" is being dealt with on the assumption that Charter provisions fully correspond to existing Treaty rights which is disputed by some observers.

Working group II “Incorporation of the Charter/accession to the ECHR”

Working document by Mr. Janusz TRZCINSKI

1. The following is an attempt to address the questions formulated in Convention document of June 18, 2002 (Conv.116/02) concerning the incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties and the accession of the Union/Community to the European Convention of Human Rights (ECHR). At this point I wish to focus on responding to the first question.

2. Ad preliminary

I am in favor of incorporating the Charter into a new basic Treaty. It would be the optimum solution if the final document was the one and only document binding on Union members, replacing the present Treaties on the European Union and on the European Community. The present situation of a multitude of treaties does not facilitate comprehension of the organization and operation of the European structures, so knowledge about them has become a kind of “secret knowledge”.

Ad 1. The incorporation of the Charter into the new Treaty should be implemented in accordance with option (f). Thus, the Charter would become a chapter (title) of the new Treaty. That kind of regulation would be clear, transparent and more readily understandable, thus bringing Union law closer to its citizens with regard to the crucial issue of protection of fundamental rights. That would also enhance identification of the average citizen of united Europe with the goals of integration.

The position presented above I base on the conviction that the Charter is, because of the character of its contents, a normative act. The analysis of each of the articles of the Charter ascertains me that they fulfil the rigours for the legal norms applied in the theory of law-making. I therefore reject the view that the Charter is a document - declaration, an act of a programmatic character. The Charter will become legally binding if it is included as a part of the future Treaty.

WG II
WD 011

EN

The question whether the Union is prepared for guaranteeing to the citizens of the member states that all the rights contained in the Charter are respected is another matter.

Ad 2. A logical consequence of adopting option (f) would be deletion of article 6(2) of the TEU, since full incorporation of the Charter would make it redundant to invoke the Convention or the constitutional traditions of the member states in the sphere of fundamental rights. The Charter as part of the Treaty would account for the sources of legal inspiration mentioned in article 6 (2) and would strengthen the protection of fundamental rights. The regulations enclosed in the art. 6 (2) of the TEU that refer to the ECHR and the constitutional traditions will be replaced by the art. 52 of the Charter, in particular its paragraph 3, and by the art. 53 of the Charter. In other words, the functions of the art. 6 (2) of the TEU will be taken over by the art. 52 and 53 of the Charter, and also, to some extent, the relevant provisions of the introductory part of the Charter having them transferred to the introductory part of the Constitutional Treaty.

Ad 3. The preamble to the Charter should become – after appropriate editorial changes – part of the Preamble to the Treaty because of the contained in it universal system of values and references to the basic documents on the protection of the rights and freedoms of the individual.

Ad 4. Incorporation of the Charter would necessitate a review of those provisions of the Treaties that deal with rights guaranteed by the Charter, and their adaptation to the new construction. In accordance with the suggestion contained in the question, ensuring the substantive and editorial cohesiveness of the new Treaty should be tackled in the future, after resolving the basic preliminary issues.

Ad 5. As regards interpretation of the new Treaty in its entirety, it would be enough to retain (after appropriate re-editing) the clause contained in article 52 (2) of the Charter, which would eliminate the need for numerous repetitions of that clause.

Ad 6. (a) The suggestion contained in the question to eliminate the reference in article 46 of the TEU to action of institutions should be accepted, since it corresponds to the established case-law of the Court of Justice.

(b) The issue taken up in the question goes beyond the basic problem of incorporation of the Charter. However, in line with the spirit of the whole reform, it would be desirable to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice to subject matter related to justice and home affairs.

(c) It is probably too early at this point to introduce direct constitutional appeals to the Court of Justice with regard to fundamental rights. First, an assessment should be made of the experiences in this regard of the member states and the possibilities incorporated in the community appeals system (article 230-4 of TEC) and the institution of preliminary rulings (article 234 of TEC).

Working document by René van der Linden

Subject: The relationship between the Charter and the ECHR

- The question whether and how to incorporate the Charter in the Treaties is primarily for the EU to decide. The impact of each of the existing options on the legal status of the Charter have been very well set out in document CONV 116/02.
- However, when examining those options, one should also take into account their possible implications on the relationship between the Charter and the European Convention on Human Rights, an aspect which was given high importance by the Convention which drafted the Charter and gave rise to lengthy discussions within that body, given the sensitivity and the complexity of the matter. What was at stake here was nothing less than coherence and legal certainty in the protection of fundamental rights across Europe.
- In this context, it should be recalled that the solutions found by that Convention – in close cooperation with the Council of Europe's observers – are based on Articles 52 § 3 and 53 of the Charter and on a reference to the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights in the Preamble of the Charter. These solutions have been considered satisfactory by all parties concerned, including the Council of Europe Observers at the Convention and the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe.

- The importance of these references to the ECHR and the Strasbourg case-law for the proper interpretation of the Charter was recently stressed by the President of the ECJ, Mr Rodríguez Iglesias, in his address at the opening of the judicial year of the Strasbourg Court. Therefore, whatever solution for a possible incorporation of the Charter is chosen, we should ensure that these references are preserved (or at least adequately replaced).
- I know that this Convention is also called upon to look into the question of a possible accession of the EC/EU to the ECHR and that in the event of this accession taking place, much of the reasons for keeping these references may at first sight seem to become obsolete. However, while I do think, like the President of the ECJ and many others, that accession is a necessary complement to the Charter, I am personally not entirely convinced at this stage that accession would make references to the ECHR in the Charter superfluous, since Article 52 § 3 of the Charter also defines the proper content of many of the rights included in the Charter.<sup>1</sup> After all, several national Constitutions of States Parties to the ECHR also make a special reference to the ECHR.
- In any event, accession has not been decided yet and even if this Convention were to advocate this solution, it is not for it to decide and to amend the Treaties accordingly; so it should not be envisaged to drop the references to the ECHR and its case-law before accession has been duly decided.
- On the question of Article 6 § 2 TEU, it is clear that we need a reference to the ECHR in the Treaties for as long as the Charter (including its references to the ECHR) is not incorporated and/or as long as accession has not yet taken place. One should not forget that Article 6 § 2 TEU has turned out to be the basis on which the ECJ has followed the ECHR and the Strasbourg case-law in an exemplary way, thereby making a substantial contribution to legal certainty and coherence in this important area.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See the wording of Article 52 § 3: “... the meaning and scope of those rights shall be the same as those laid down by the said Convention”

<sup>2</sup> “... even though the Convention is not formally applied as a constituent element of Community law, being instead merely taken into account as a source of inspiration for the purposes of identifying general principles, the case-law of the Court of Justice clearly shows that it applies the Convention as if its provisions formed an integral part of Community law” (Mr Rodríguez Iglesias, President of the ECJ, Strasbourg, 31 January 2002, translation).

Subject : Note by Neil MacCormick "Clarifying Horizontal Articles"

Following the discussion on the morning of 22 July, I attach suggested modifications of Charter Articles 51.1 and 2, and 52.2.

I believe that adoption of these amendments would meet the principal points of difficulty raised by Baroness Scotland in relation to the 'horizontal' provisions of the Charter, and the relationship of the Charter to the rest of the constitution-treaty if it were incorporated therein, as in my opinion it ought to be.

Scope

1. The provisions of this Charter are addressed to the institutions and bodies of the Union with due regard for the principle of subsidiarity and to the Member States only when they are implementing Union law. They shall therefore respect the rights, observe the principles and promote the application thereof only in accordance with the (two words deleted) powers conferred on the bodies and institutions of the Union by or under other Chapters of this constitution-treaty.

2. This Charter does not establish any new power or task for the Community or the Union, or modify powers and tasks defined by the (one word deleted) other Chapters of this constitution-treaty.

52 Scope of guaranteed rights

1. Any limitation on the exercise of the rights and freedoms recognised by this Charter must be provided for by law and respect the essence of those rights and freedoms. Subject to the principle of proportionality, limitations may be made only if they are necessary and genuinely meet objectives of general interest recognised by the Union or the need to protect the rights and freedoms of others.

2. Rights recognised by this Charter (thirteen words deleted) with a view to affirming the fundamental character of rights for which more detailed provision is made in another chapters of this constitution-treaty shall be exercised under the conditions and within the limits laid down in the relevant chapter. (fourteen words deleted)

3. In so far as this Charter contains rights which correspond to rights guaranteed by the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the meaning and scope of those rights shall be the same as those laid down by the said Convention. This provision shall not prevent Union law providing more extensive protection.

Working group II "Incorporation of the Charter/accession to the ECHR"

Document by Mr. Ingvar Svensson and Mrs. Lena Hjelm-Wallén*Subject: Proposals for Accession of the EU to the European Convention on Human Rights

Intervention in favour of an accession of the EC/EU to the ECHR.

(1 enclosure)

This paper - presented as a working document to the members of Working Group 2 - deals with one of the two main issues with which our working group is entrusted, i.e. the accession of the European Communities/European Union to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR)<sup>1</sup>.

* * * * *

An accession of the EC/EU to the ECHR has been advocated for over 20 years. The proposal is endorsed i. a. by the European Parliament, the European Commission, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, most member States of the European Union and of the Council of Europe, by the "Comité des Sages" (in its human rights agenda for the European Union for the year 2000) as well as by members of national parliaments, numerous other politicians, lawyers in member states and human rights NGO:s. The purpose of accession is not to confer general competence on the European Union in the field of human rights, but merely to commit the EU to the human rights standards to which its member States are bound and to submit EU institutions to the same external scrutiny by the Strasbourg Court as all national authorities. An accession, as such, would not affect the current distribution of competencies between the Union and its member States.

The fundamental political and legal arguments in favour of accession remain:

- Accession would strengthen the protection of European citizens who are presently denied the right to bring applications against the institutions of the European Union before the Strasbourg Court.
- It is essential to avoid a situation in which there are alternative, competing and conflicting systems of human rights protection within the European Union and in greater Europe.
- Dual protection systems would weaken the overall protection offered and undermine legal certainty in the human rights field in Europe. Divergent catalogues would be applied by the European Court of Human Rights and the Court of Justice, each acting within its own context. The risk of divergent praxis is not just theoretical. It has already occurred and will continue to pose problems<sup>2</sup>.
- Acts by some EU bodies remain outside any effective judicial control<sup>3</sup> and yet the Strasbourg Court will continue to hold member states responsible<sup>4</sup>.
- The credibility of the Community in the eyes of third countries would be considerably enhanced if we were prepared to arrange for an independent body to subject respect for human rights to a critical review.
- Accession would have the advantage of enabling the Community institutions to play a full role in proceedings before the European Court of Human Rights that concern Community law.

<sup>1</sup> The question of the Union's legal personality is under consideration in Working group 3. This paper remains neutral on that particular issue even though the present contribution alternately uses the expressions European Community (EC) or the European Union (EU).

<sup>2</sup> Reference can be made to the question whether a person's right to respect for his or her home (Article 8 of the ECHR) covers also business premises, the precise scope of the right to remain silent and not to contribute to incriminating oneself (Article 6 of the ECHR) or to the judgments given with respect to the prohibition to disseminate in Ireland information regarding abortions lawfully carried out in the United Kingdom (Art 10 ECHR). Such differences of approach can be explained by the simple fact that one court has primarily the responsibility to ensure the efficient operation of the internal market, while the other is charged with protecting fundamental rights.

<sup>3</sup> The Luxemburg Court is not competent to review the operational activities of Europol or other bodies set up by conventions adopted under Title VI of the EU Treaty.

<sup>4</sup> See for instance Cantoni v. France (1996) or T.I v. UK (appl. 43844; 7 March 2000). NB also the pending case of Senator Lines (Appl. 56672/00).

- Accession would prevent the creation of new dividing lines on the European continent. The human rights acquis of the Council of Europe and the common standards defended by the member States of the Council of Europe (44 member States) and of the European Union are the same. An accession is not in contradiction with the right of the EU and its member states to offer higher levels of human rights protection in certain areas. On the other hand, a dual system of rights poses a risk not only to the fundamental principle of universality of human rights but also the inherent danger of the re-emergence of a "Europe à deux vitesses" in an area - common human rights standards - where such divisions must not exist.

- Special arrangements between the two Courts have been discussed but is not a valid option for a future with unknown developments. Accession therefore remains the most effective way to ensure the necessary coherence between the ECHR and Community law - provided that it is regulated in a manner consistent with existing Community competence.

* * *

Many of the legal and technical problems of an accession have been considered and can be overcome<sup>5</sup> but in the light of hesitations expressed against accession, the following issues seem to require particular comments, in some cases further exploration:

1. Lacking competence.

In its opinion 2/94, the ECJ stated that according to the then existing Community law the Community lacked competence to accede to the ECHR. This is till the case but in the preparations for the Nice Intergovernmental Conference Finland, supported by several other EU partners, took the initiative<sup>6</sup> to propose a modification to article 303 of the Treaty on the European Community which would allow for the EC to accede to the ECHR. The proposal was and remains a quite simple amendment to article 303 as follows: "The Community shall establish all appropriate forms of cooperation with the Council of Europe. The Community shall have the competence to accede to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, signed in Rome on 4 November, 1950".

It is suggested that the working group makes a recommendation to this effect in its report to the plenary.

2. Threat to the Community legal order.

The most frequent argument against accession is that it would threaten the autonomy of the Community legal order. The answer to that argument is the following: Community law as such is not opposed to the integration of the European Community into a treaty-based judicial mechanism.

---

<sup>5</sup> See in this respect report by a working group of the Steering Committee on Human Rights of the Council of Europe (CDDH), doc GT-DH-EU (2002), approved by the CDDH at its 53rd meeting and subsequently approved by the Committee of Ministers at its meeting on 11 July 2002.

<sup>6</sup> See doc no. CONFER 4775/00). Alternatively the accession should be made by the European Union if and when it gains legal personality.

The EC is already Party to Council of Europe "partial agreements" and conventions<sup>7</sup>. The European Union could make a general declaration of competence similar to the one made in respect of the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea<sup>8</sup>. The EC has agreed to submit the Community legal order to the compulsory dispute resolution mechanism of the WTO. Prominent representatives of EU institutions agree that there are other international conventions to which the European Union may well have reason to accede in the future. In this context one could also note that the EU urges third states to accept the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. Therefore, in the central sphere of human rights one cannot continue to argue that the Community legal order should remain exempt from external control.

It is suggested that these arguments be retained in the report of the working group concerning the issue of accession.

3. Uncertainty regarding ensuing obligations.

Yet another argument is that it is not quite clear what the accession entails as far as obligations for the European Union are concerned. As a starting point, it should be noted that the scope of EU accession would be limited to areas in respect of which the Union already has competence under the EU treaties.

For the sake of legal certainty, it could be stipulated in the accession treaty that the Convention and its protocols will be binding upon the European Union only in those areas in which it is competent. Such a treaty could also contain a provision enabling the ECJ to be consulted by the European Court of Human Rights in matters where questions of competence arise. As mentioned above the European Union could therefore make a general declaration of competence similar to the one made in respect of the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea. Alternatively, the EC/EU could also deal with this particular question in the form of an appropriately phrased reservation.

<sup>7</sup> Per 20 January 2002 – the EC was a party to 7 Conventions of the Council of Europe, mainly in the medical/pharmaceutical and animal protection fields: ETS 26, 33, 39, 84, 87, 104,123 as well as to Partial Agreements such as the European Pharmacopea and EURIMAGES . In addition, other CoE conventions have been drafted or modified to allow for EC accession if such was deemed appropriate.

<sup>8</sup> This suggestion was made by Mr Petite, Director General of the Legal Service of the Commission, during his hearing before the Working Party, working document no. 13 of 2 August 2002, page 52.

It is suggested that also these arguments be retained in the report of the working group concerning the issue of accession.

4. An uneven application of the ECHR.

Reference has also been made to the fact that an "uneven application" of the Convention might result from the fact that the current members of the European Union have not ratified all ECHR protocols equally and that individual member States have made various reservations to the ECHR and its protocols. Regarding the ECHR protocols, the actual differences in ratification between the current EU members are not that great. All current EU member States have ratified Protocols Nos. 1 and 6 to the ECHR. Protocols Nos. 4 and 7 have been ratified by 12 and 9 EU member States respectively. Protocols No. 12 and 13 have only been opened for signature in 2000 and 2002 respectively and are therefore not yet largely ratified. A more detailed information is given in the attached tables. In this context, attention must also be paid and solutions found to such issues as the right of derogation and the "margin of appreciation" currently ensured to States Parties to the ECHR through the Convention and by the caselaw of the Court in Strasbourg.

It is suggested that also these arguments be retained in the report of the working group.

5. Requirements regarding remedies.

Attention has been directed to Art 13 of the ECHR which obliges parties to the convention to provide everyone - whose rights and freedoms as set forth in the Convention have been violated - with an effective remedy before a national authority. This is an area which requires attention. There may be a need for improvements in judicial protection within the EU. In a recent case, the ECJ has confirmed that it is possible to envisage a system of judicial review of legality of Community measures of general application different from that established by the founding Treaty. But the Court held that it is for the Member states, if necessary, to reform the system currently in force<sup>9</sup>.

6. An accession would be too complicated from a treaty point of view.

Some argue that an accession is also too complicated and cumbersome from the point of view of treaty law and that an amending Protocol to the ECHR must be ratified by all Council of Europe member States. The Council of Europe has suggested that instead of concluding an amending protocol between the current States Parties to the ECHR, it could be envisaged to prepare an accession treaty between all States Parties to the ECHR and the EC/EU. Such a procedure is already used within the European Union for the admission of new member States. Article 49 paragraph 2 of the EU Treaty provides that the conditions of admission and the adjustments to the EU Treaties “shall be the subject of an agreement between the member States and the applicant State”.

It is suggested that this solution is also retained among the recommendations from the working group.

Enclosure.

The protocols, like the Convention itself, guarantee minimum standards which largely coincide with universal standards laid down in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which all EU member States are Parties. Several rights guaranteed by the ECHR protocols have directly influenced the wording of corresponding articles contained in the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights.

An accession to the ECHR protocols could be gradual, starting with the Convention and Protocols No. 1 and 6, which have been ratified by all EU member States. As in the case of the Convention itself, the EU would accede to the protocols only to the extent of its existing competencies. The legal situation of member States which have not ratified a particular protocol would therefore remain unaffected in so far as their national law and practice are concerned.

In this context one should also observe reservations made by EU member States with respect to individual provisions of the Convention and its protocols concerning areas which are currently not within EU competence, such as administrative judicial procedure (Austria, Finland), legal aid (Ireland) or the legal status of members of the national armed forces (France, Portugal and Spain). However, these reservations would continue to apply with respect to national law and practice even if the EC/EU were to ratify the Convention without any reservations. Even if EU competencies were to extend, at a later stage, to areas such as armed forces, the EU would only be bound with respect to armed forces that would be under EU command and control. National armed forces would continue to be governed by national regulations, and these States' obligations under the ECHR in this respect would continue to be circumscribed by the reservations made. It would therefore seem appropriate to limit reservations by the EC/EU in the event of accession to matters specific to the EC/EU<sup>10</sup>.

Working group II "Incorporation of the Charter/accession to the ECHR"

Subject : Note by Baroness Scotland of Asthal: "The search for the "missing horizontal" in the Charter of Rights – an interim report on progress"

I. Introduction

1. My paper on the "missing" horizontal article in the Charter of Rights<sup>1</sup> discussed the problem concerning the meaning and scope of provisions in the Charter which are based neither on the Treaties nor on the ECHR. Since then our Working Group has had the benefit of the opinion of M. Piris<sup>2</sup>, Director-General of the Council Legal Service, that the existing horizontal articles in the Charter are insufficient. I have also studied Professor Mac Cormick's paper<sup>3</sup> which contains helpful proposals for dealing with some (but not all) of the problem. My paper, for discussion, reports further progress. It is intended to help find a positive way to give the Charter greater legal status without losing or changing the wording of any of the substantive Charter articles.

The problem

2. Charter Article 52 does not deal with all the rights in the Charter. 52(2) tells us about rights which are based on the Community Treaties or the Treaty on European Union; and 52(3) tells us about rights corresponding to provisions in the ECHR. But there is no 52(4) to tell us how to interpret Charter provisions which do not fall into either of those categories.

What legal meaning and scope should be given to those provisions in a legally binding Charter by our citizens, or the Court?

3. Amongst the horizontal articles, the only available guide to the interpretation of such provisions appears to be Charter Article 51. But that article deals with the scope of the provisions of the Charter as a whole and the general exclusion of any new powers or tasks for the Community or the Union. It would leave many ambiguities and unresolved questions were the Charter to be incorporated within the Treaties. For example, does Article 51 mean that Charter provisions based neither on the Community Treaties or ECHR are to be interpreted as having no legal effect?

4. My earlier paper gave examples of Charter provisions which appear to fall into this uncertain category. I offered some practical illustrations<sup>4</sup> of why the absence of a horizontal article to deal with them could be a serious difficulty. The problem is essentially one of ambiguity and the absence of legal certainty. And the more status the Charter is given, the more important it is to be clear about what such provisions actually mean. We should not open Europe to the accusation that it is misleading its citizens. And national Governments will expect to be clear about the obligations a legally incorporated Charter entails for them. I believe that our Group should address such issues directly in its Report to the Convention plenary – and make appropriate recommendations.

<sup>4</sup> My paper listed Article 3 (right to integrity), 9 (right to marry), 10 (freedom of thought, conscience and religion), 13 (freedom of the arts), 14 (right to education), 19 (Protection in the event of removal, expulsion or extradition), 21 (non-discrimination), 24 (rights of the child), 25 (rights of the elderly), 26 (integration of the persons with disability), 28 (right of collective bargaining and action), 29 (right of access to placement services), 30 (protection in the event of unjustified dismissal), 31 (fair and just working conditions), 32 (child labour), 33 (family and professional life), 50 (right not to be tried or punished twice in criminal proceedings for the same criminal offence).

A. Clues

5. I do not claim to have discovered a simple, single answer to the problem. However, our Working Group discussions have pointed us towards three concepts which are already within the Charter and which seem to be important clues towards an acceptable solution. Indeed, I think that it is common ground that these three concepts formed part of the approach which enabled a consensus on the Charter to be reached within the original Convention. They are:

- A. existing Community law on the constitutional traditions common to the Members States which is referred to in the Charter Preamble<sup>5</sup> and in the Commentary<sup>6</sup>
- B. the concept of "principles" which also appears in the Charter Preamble<sup>7</sup>, in Charter Article 51(1) – "observe the principles" – and in several of the substantive Charter articles<sup>8</sup> and commentaries<sup>9</sup>
- C. the references to subsidiarity in the Charter Preamble<sup>10</sup>, Article 51(1) and the related references to "national law and practices" in the texts of some of the articles themselves<sup>11</sup>.

6. In the present Charter text these three important concepts are not dealt with in the same way as those provisions of the Charter which correspond to provisions of the ECHR or the Union and Community treaties (dealt with by Charter Articles 52(2) and 52(3)). In particular, it is for the most part not clear which concept applies to which Charter article. There is the possibility that some Charter articles do not benefit from A, B or C, or from the existing provisions in Charter article 52. Is such uncertainty tolerable in a Charter which has legal status beyond that of a solemn declaration?

II. Way forward?

7. I believe that the “missing horizontal” (notionally 52(4)) should address itself to all the Charter provisions not covered by 52(2) and 52(3). Following the logic of the Charter itself (as discussed above) the “missing horizontal” should contain three elements. First, regarding the constitutional traditions, the new horizontal provision could usefully confirm that, in the cases where the remaining Charter provisions are indeed part of the constitutional traditions of all the Member States, they enjoy the status of general principles of law which the Community must respect<sup>12</sup>. I would go further and say that, even where a Charter provision does not have that status, it should be regarded, by virtue of its inclusion in the Charter, as an aspiration for the Union.

8. It might also be possible to connect this latter point with the Charter concept of “principles” so that the aspirational character of all such Charter articles is suitably clarified and confirmed. But special provision concerning “principles” would be desirable even if no such connection is made. We should avoid the possibility of confusion between, on the one hand, the meaning of “principles” as in Article 6(2) of the Union Treaty and, on the other hand, the “principles” referred to in Charter Article 51 which are to be observed by the institutions and bodies of the Union within the strict limits of their competences.

9. As regards subsidiarity, it should not be necessary to duplicate the general reference to the topic which is made in Charter Article 51. However, I believe that there may be a special need to reflect the fact that some Charter provisions refer in particular to national bargaining and action), 30 (protection in the event of unjustified dismissal), 34 (social security), 35 (health care), 36 (access to services of general economic interest).

law and practice. The new horizontal provision could require full regard to be given to such references.

10. I believe that it should be possible to draft an extension to Charter Article 52, to cover the matters I have proposed, with economy and precision.

11. Finally, I would strongly support the expert opinion put forward to our Group by M. Piris that the interests of legal certainty and security also require clarification of precisely which Charter provisions are referred to by Charter Articles 52(2) and 52(3). M. Piris suggested that the Commentary issued by the Praesidium to the original Convention was helpful to us in that regard. He also suggested that it should make clear that the restriction on new (or modified) tasks or powers in Article 51 applies also to Article 52 (and the other horizontal articles). I believe that our Group should consider these points with a view to making a recommendation on this matter as well.

Summary

12. There is currently a gap in Charter Article 52. This gap could prejudice a favourable decision on incorporating the substantive articles of the Charter in their current form. I believe we can build on the work of our predecessors to fill that gap in a positive way.

Working Group II

Working document 17

Working group II "Incorporation of the Charter/accession to the ECHR"

Subject: Enforceability of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and improvement of the individual's right to legal redress

Working Document by Professor Jürgen Meyer, Delegate of the German Bundestag to the Constitutional Convention of the European Union

Proposal: The second half of Article 230 (4) EC be amended to read as follows:

Any natural or legal person may, under the same conditions, institute proceedings against a decision addressed to that person or against a decision which, although in the form of a regulation or a decision addressed to another person, is of direct or individual concern to the former.

Grounds:

Make it clear that the Charter is enforceable

A Charter which, although binding as part of community law, cannot be enforced by the individual, or only under onerous conditions, will not be accepted by the citizens. The Convention must therefore clearly answer citizens' questions about the procedure by means of which they can they directly enforce their Charter of Fundamental Rights.

The best way of ensuring the strictly binding nature of the individual rights set out in the Charter, and in particular the right to effective judicial redress set out under Article 47, is a modification to the current system for obtaining individual legal redress. The proposal put forward here allows the citizens to bring a claim for breach of their (fundamental) rights before the European Court, directly and by their own decision.

A provision should be inserted into the text of the Charter, into Article 47 for example, which makes reference to such a remedy:

“Under the conditions set forth in Article 230(4) EC, every person shall have the right to bring a claim due to a breach of the rights and freedoms recognised in this Charter.”

Make it easier to bring direct claims before the European Court

There are two situations, in particular, where the individual should not find himself in a position where he can obtain legal address only after a specific measure directed against him has been taken. Challenges to a Community decision should be admissible,

1) if a decision taken is of direct concern to him, i.e. the legal measure subject to the challenge directly affects his legal position and there is no margin for discretion regarding an implementation measure that may be required,

or

2) if a decision taken is of individual concern to him, i.e. the legal measure subject to the challenge affects him due to certain personal characteristics or special circumstances and therefore individualises him in a way similar to a decision addressed to a specific person.

Both situations in which a citizen may find himself, should be seen as independent from one another. Each one requires that it be possible to determine legality without further delay. The proposed amendment therefore changes the two requirements of Article 230(4) EC, which until now had to be applied cumulatively, with the result that they now represent alternative options.

Remove the deficiencies in the existing system for obtaining legal redress

One aim of the proposed reform is to close the gaps which are present in the existing system for obtaining legal redress. In practice, the two options for seeking legal address – i.e. direct claims and the preliminary decision-making procedure – have, in certain cases, failed to provide effective legal protection for the citizens.

Until recently, the expectation was that the European Court might change its established practice with respect to the admissibility of direct claims by private individuals. In its judgement dated 25th July 2002, however, it stated that on the basis of the wording of Article 230 EC, further easing of the conditions for an individual claim was not possible. Express reference was made to the possibility of a change in primary legislation.<sup>1</sup>

The proposed amendment reliably ensures that all claims which were admissible under existing law, would still be so after the amendment. The procedural acquis communautaire remains fully intact.

The additional workload for the courts is not a convincing objection

It is true that this amendment will probably increase the workload of the European courts. However, in a community based on constitutional rights, this must not prevent the implementation of a change in the system for obtaining legal redress that is considered to be expedient. Rather, the Court of First Instance attached to the European Court of Justice must be provided with the necessary institutional and human resources to enable it to guarantee effective legal protection for the entire duration of the proceedings. The reform of the judicature by the Nice Treaty has brought about improved conditions in this respect (Art. 225, 225a EC).

Working group II "Incorporation of the Charter/accession to the ECHR"

Working document by Mr Esko Helle, supported by Mr Vytenis Andriukaitis and Mr Neil MacCormick.

Subject: Accession by the European Union to the European Convention on Human Rights

1 Introduction

1. Along the lines of the Laeken Declaration, the Convention is expected to consider the question whether the European Union<sup>1</sup> should accede to the European Convention on Human Rights (hereafter "ECHR"). Technically, the question is whether the new basic treaty should contain a specific power-conferring provision (legal basis) authorising the accession by the Union to the ECHR. For the moment, the Union's founding Treaties do not contain such a legal basis and, the Court of Justice has held, the Union has no competence to accede to the ECHR.<sup>2</sup>
2. By now, it is clear that an accession to the ECHR by the Union would not be an alternative to the granting of a legal status to the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights. These two initiatives pursue the same objective – the protection of human/fundamental rights – but with different means and functions and, hence, are to be regarded as complementary.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The use of the term "Union" hereafter is in no way intended to prejudge the question whether it was the Union or the Community that acceded to the ECHR – a question that depends on, inter alia, whether the Union will be attributed single legal personality.

3. The arguments for the accession by the Union to the European Convention are so well known that they hardly need to be repeated in detail. Suffice it to recall that the Union is taking over more and more legislative and other functions from the Member States who are all Contracting Parties to the ECHR concluded in 1950. In order to maintain the significance of the ECHR, it is therefore indispensable, from the point of view of the citizen in particular, that the Union accedes to the Convention.
4. The accession has however been purported to involve certain problems which concern, on the one hand, the position of the Union legal order and, on the other, the relationship between the Union and the Member States. These are, in particular, the effects of the accession upon the autonomy of Union law; the distribution of competence between the Union and the Member States; and the differences in the degree to which the Member States have signed up to the Protocols of the ECHR and/or made reservations to the Convention.
5. The purpose of this initiative is to express our support for the accession by the Union to the ECHR and to propose a text of a new legal basis to that effect. We will also briefly seek to show why we consider that the above mentioned problems relating to accession are more apparent than real – or, at least, not insuperable.

2. The Autonomy of Union Law

6. The claim that the Union's accession to the ECHR would adversely affect the autonomy of Union law is mainly based on the argument that, under the ECHR, the European Court of Justice would lose its monopoly to rule on the validity and interpretation of Union law. The Court of Justice would, the argument is, also lose its role as the sole arbiter in disputes amongst the Member States and between the Member States and the institutions.
7. We do not find these arguments convincing. In the first place, the relationship between the Court of Human Rights and the courts of the Contracting Parties to the ECHR may not be described as a hierarchical one: the Human Rights Court has no power to rule on the validity or interpretation of the laws of the Contracting Parties but can only establish violations of the Convention.<sup>4</sup> In any case, the European Court of Justice has acknowledged that the Union's competence in the field of international relations necessarily entails the power to submit to the decisions of a court which is created or designated by such an agreement as regards the interpretation and application of its provisions.<sup>5</sup> The European Court of Human Rights would by no means be the only international judicial body the decisions of which are binding on the Union and its institutions including the Court of Justice.<sup>6</sup> In fact, the Human Rights Court, too, already now increasingly often rules, directly or indirectly, on acts of the Union. However, in the present situation where the Union is not party to the ECHR, there is a risk that the Union's institutions are not in a position to defend their actions before the Court, and it is the Member States that are being held responsible for acts or omissions on which they had little if any influence.<sup>7</sup>

3. The Distribution of Competence between the Union and the Member States

8. It has been argued that accession by the Union to the ECHR would give rise to a shift of competence from the Member States to the Union in the field of fundamental human rights, in particular, as a result of the positive obligations deriving from the European Convention.
9. Again, we do not share this view. First, the obligations under the ECHR are predominantly obligations to respect the rights contained in the Convention and, thus, by nature entail restrictions on the exercise of competence by the Contracting Parties rather than positive obligations requiring them to take certain measures. Thus, in the event of accession to the Convention by the Union too, the status as a Contracting Party does not automatically imply any general competence in the field of fundamental human rights.
10. While it is true that complying with the obligations laid down by the ECHR may in some circumstances require positive action and, by implication, the requisite competence, the latter is inextricably linked to the substantive competence possessed by the entity in question. Human rights can be described as "horizontal" provisions that do not easily fit in the traditional division of competence according to the specific policy area. They are rights and principles that have to be taken account of in any field of law by the legislator as well as by the courts and administration. It is therefore clear that any positive obligations that might derive from the ECHR would only become relevant in cases where the Union already had the competence to act under some substantive provision of the Treaty. This means that the respective obligations of the Union and the Member States to exercise competence pursuant to the ECHR do not imply any zero-sum game in respect of the division of competence. In other words, both the Union and the Member States would be under an obligation to carry out the necessary measures under the Convention within their respective spheres of competence. The logic is analogous to that in Article 51.1., second sentence, of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights.<sup>8</sup>
11. Furthermore, the European Union has already committed itself to respecting human rights – and the ECHR, in particular – as general principles of Union law. It is therefore plausible to suggest that accession to the ECHR would not entail any new obligations for the Union but only modify the nature of that commitment. This is, for the reasons stated above, equally true with the claim that the accession might change the distribution of competence between the Union and the Member States. An express provision to that effect might even be included in the legal basis conferring competence upon the Union to accede to the ECHR, along the lines of Article 51.2 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>8</sup> "They shall therefore respect the rights, observe the principles and promote the application thereof in accordance with their respective powers."

<sup>9</sup> Art. 51.2. "This Charter does not establish any new power or task for the Community or the Union, or modify powers and tasks defined by the Treaties."

4. The Legal Basis for the Accession of the European Union to the ECHR

12. In the light of the above considerations, we propose that the following provision would be included, at an appropriate location, in the new basic treaty:

Article ?

-----

The Union shall seek to accede to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms signed in Rome on 4 November 1950<sup>10</sup>, in accordance with the procedures set out in [the current Article 300 EC]<sup>11</sup>. Accession to the Convention shall in no way modify the powers and tasks of the Union as defined by this Treaty.

5. Questions to be Addressed in Negotiations on Accession

13. There are also other legal questions which relate to the accession by the Union to the ECHR. These do not however pertain to the reform of the EU Treaties but to the amendment of the ECHR to cater for the Union's accession<sup>12</sup>, and may therefore only be solved in the eventual negotiations on the accession. At that stage there, of course, needs to be a consensus among the Member States on the choice of various options that are available. Such questions include:
- to which Protocols of the Convention the Union should accede to and whether it should make reservations to the Convention or the Protocols;
  - the modalities of accession, e.g., whether the accession should be carried out by an amending protocol or an accession treaty;
  - the modalities of participation by the Union in the decision-making structures of the Convention, e.g., the representation of the EU in the Committee of Ministers, status and participation in the European Court of Human Rights of an EU judge;
  - the standing of the Union in proceedings before the European Court of Human Rights; the more specific technical implications for the procedure in the European Court of Justice

<sup>10</sup> Another option to be considered would be the Union should be given competence to accede, in general, to international agreements for the protection and promotion of human rights, as proposed by Mr. Jacob Söderman, European Ombudsman in CONV 221/02 CONTRIB 76.

<sup>11</sup> A specific procedure reflecting the paramount importance and particular nature of the commitment to protect human rights should be added to Art. 300 EC. Another option would be to lay down the procedure in the provision authorising the accession.

<sup>12</sup> Since the ECHR is currently only open to accession by States, it is clear that the Convention would have to be amended upon the accession by the Union. See especially the Activity Report by the Working Group on the Legal and Technical Issues of a Possible EC/EU Accession to the European Convention on Human Rights, doc. GT-DH-EU (2002) 012, approved by the Steering Committee for Human Rights (CDDH) of the Council of Europe.

NOTE FOR THE WORKING GROUP ON THE CHARTER/ECHR

Necessary changes to the system of judicial remedies

F.G. Jacobs <sup>1</sup>

I have been invited to consider what changes in the system of judicial remedies are necessary if there is agreement in the Convention on giving some form of effect to the Charter of Fundamental Rights and on acceding to the European Convention on Human Rights

Such changes are necessary, first, because some of the features of the existing system are likely to prove incompatible with fundamental rights contained in the Charter and the ECHR: in particular, the right of access to a court and the right to an effective remedy. From a legal point of view it is clearly undesirable for there to be conflicts between the fundamental rights recognised or referred to in the treaty and the provisions on remedies contained in another part thereof. From a political point of view the Union could be accused of hypocrisy or double standards.

Secondly, the fundamental rights so recognised or referred to risk remaining an empty shell if there is no system of judicial remedies which guarantees the effective protection of those rights. In the absence of rules guaranteeing effective remedies a decision to give some form of effect to the Charter and accede to the ECHR might be regarded as mere window-dressing exercises.

Moreover it will be widely accepted that there is a close link between the effective protection of fundamental rights and the legitimacy of the European Union.

The Working Group recognised that it could not examine some of the issues concerning judicial remedies at an earlier stage since the Court of Justice had decided in the UPA case<sup>2</sup> to re-examine its restrictive case-law on the standing of individuals challenging the legality of measures of general application, i.e. regulations and directives. In its judgment in that case however the Court of Justice decided essentially not to depart from the existing case-law and stated that, whilst a different system of remedies could indeed be envisaged, such a change would require treaty amendment and thus go beyond its jurisdiction. That statement can perhaps be read as an invitation for the Convention to consider changes in the system of remedies.

As a preliminary point I would note that it has been assumed in some quarters that a decision to give some form of effect to the Charter should be accompanied by the introduction of a special new remedy to enable an individual to bring an alleged infringement directly before the Court of Justice. This would however be both unnecessary and inappropriate. Issues of fundamental rights already arise in connection with the application of the ordinary remedies, often in combination with other issues (e.g. equal treatment, proportionality, etc.), and can and should continue to be dealt with in principle within the habitual procedural framework.

The existing system of remedies is however not adequate in three other crucial respects. At this stage the three issues can be identified very briefly.

1. Standing of individuals to challenge general measures

As has been widely recognised, standing for individuals needs to be enlarged so as to enable them to challenge general measures which affect their rights or interests.

The formulation in Article 230 EC, which requires that the measure challenged should be of direct and individual concern to the applicant, has proved too restrictive. It means in practice that the legality of a regulation affecting the rights or interests of individuals cannot be challenged by those individuals merely because it is a general measure. The current state of the law is essentially based on the assumption that individuals can obtain a reference to the Court of Justice from a national court on the validity of a general measure. That however is a circuitous and uncertain route, which can also result in a denial of justice where for example there is no national measure to challenge in the national court, or where the national court fails to make a satisfactory reference to the Court of Justice. A further consequence is that, the greater the number of persons affected by a measure of the Community institutions, the less likely it is that effective judicial review will be available.

Doubts about the appropriateness of the law as it stands had long been expressed by the Court of Justice itself <sup>3</sup>, by several members of the Court in their extra-judicial writing and by many scholars <sup>4</sup>.

The Court of Justice decided in the above-mentioned UPA case to re-examine the case-law in plenary formation. Although I took the view, in my Opinion as Advocate General, that the necessary change could be made by the Court itself revising its case-law, the Court felt that such an important change would require treaty amendment <sup>5</sup>.

In May of this year the Court of First Instance, relying in part on the Charter, showed itself willing, in the Jégo-Quéré case <sup>6</sup>, to depart from the existing case-law and to facilitate challenges to general measures. That was particularly significant since that Court is the court most concerned by a possible change, as the court of first resort for individual applicants. Its decision seems to refute what was previously seen as the strongest argument against enlarging access to the Community Courts, namely the risk of overload – the "floodgates" argument.

<sup>3</sup>. See the Report of the Court of Justice on Certain Aspects of the Application of the Treaty on European Union, May 1995, paragraph 20.

<sup>4</sup>. For references, see the Opinion of 21 March 2002 in Case C-50/00 P Unión de Pequeños Agricultores v Council, notes 5 and 6.

<sup>5</sup>. A summary of the main arguments is contained in my Opinion, an extract from which is annexed to this note.

It may be concluded that both Community Courts have now acknowledged the appropriateness or even the need for treaty amendment on this point.

2. Extension of the scope of judicial review to measures taken by all institutions and bodies of the Union

The Treaty allows challenges by individuals only to measures taken by the Institutions. The Charter is however (rightly) addressed to the "institutions and bodies" of the Union. It seems clear therefore that an action must be available to individuals against measures adopted by all institutions and bodies of the Union (Europol etc.).

3. Extension of the scope of judicial review to measures across the whole range of Union activities

Under the current system the Community Courts' jurisdiction is severely limited or even excluded as regards the Union's activities in certain fields. In particular the limitations under Article 68 EC and under Title VI of the Treaty on European Union – areas where the need for an effective protection of fundamental rights is of special importance – raise serious questions about the compatibility of the current state of the law with the Charter and the ECHR. It will therefore be important to ensure that the Community Courts have jurisdiction to review all measures across the whole range of Union activities. Since those measures will in any event be subject to review by the European Court of Human Rights in the event of accession to the ECHR, any argument for excluding them from review by the Community Courts seems to have little force.

Extract from the Opinion in UPA

(paragraphs 100-103)

Conclusion

100 The case-law on the standing of individuals to bring proceedings before the Court of Justice (now before the Court of First Instance) has, over the years, given rise to a large volume of discussion, much of it very critical. It cannot be denied that the limited admissibility of actions by individuals is widely regarded as one of the least satisfactory aspects of the Community legal system.<sup>1</sup> It is not merely the restriction on access which is criticised; it is also the complexity and apparent inconsistency which have resulted from attempts by the Court to allow access where the traditional approach would lead to a manifest 'denial of justice'. Thus, one of the fullest and most authoritative recent studies refers to 'the blot on the landscape of Community law which the case-law on admissibility has become'.<sup>2</sup> While there may be doubts about the degree of criticism that can be levelled at the case-law, it is surely indisputable that access to the Court is one area above all where it is essential that the law itself should be clear, coherent and readily understandable.

101 In this Opinion I have argued that the Court should Ā rather than envisage, on the basis of Greenpeace, a further limited exception to its restrictive case-law on standing Ā instead re-consider that case-law and adopt a more satisfactory interpretation of the concept of individual concern.

1 See above note 5.

2 A. Arnall, 'Private applicants and the action for annulment since Codorniu', cited in note 6, at p. 52.

102 It may be helpful to summarise the reasons for that view, as follows:

- (1) The Court's fundamental assumption that the possibility for an individual applicant to trigger a reference for a preliminary ruling provides full and effective judicial protection against general measures is open to serious objections:
  - under the preliminary ruling procedure the applicant has no right to decide whether a reference is made, which measures are referred for review or what grounds of invalidity are raised and thus no right of access to the Court of Justice; on the other hand, the national court cannot itself grant the desired remedy to declare the general measure in issue invalid;
  - there may be a denial of justice in cases where it is difficult or impossible for an applicant to challenge a general measure indirectly (e.g. where there are no challengeable implementing measures or where the applicant would have to break the law in order to be able to challenge ensuing sanctions);
  - legal certainty pleads in favour of allowing a general measure to be reviewed as soon as possible and not only after implementing measures have been adopted;
  - indirect challenges to general measures through references on validity under Article 234 EC present a number of procedural disadvantages in comparison to direct challenges under Article 230 EC before the Court of First Instance as regards for example the participation of the institution(s) which adopted the measure, the delays and costs involved, the award of interim measures or the possibility of third party intervention.
- (2) Those objections cannot be overcome by granting standing by way of exception in those cases where an applicant has under national law no way of triggering a reference for a preliminary ruling on the validity of the contested measure. Such an approach
  - has no basis in the wording of the Treaty;

- would inevitably oblige the Community Courts to interpret and apply rules of national law, a task for which they are neither well prepared nor even competent;
  - would lead to inequality between operators from different Member States and to a further loss of legal certainty.
- (3) Nor can those objections be overcome by postulating an obligation for the legal orders of the Member States to ensure that references on the validity of general Community measures are available in their legal systems. Such an approach would - leave unresolved most of the problems of the current situation such as the absence of remedy as a matter of right, unnecessary delays and costs for the applicant or the award of interim measures;
  - be difficult to monitor and enforce; and
  - require far-reaching interference with national procedural autonomy.
- (4) The only satisfactory solution is therefore to recognise that an applicant is individually concerned by a Community measure where the measure has, or is liable to have, a substantial adverse effect on his interests. That solution has the following advantages:
- it resolves all the problems set out above: applicants are granted a true right of direct access to a court which can grant a remedy, cases of possible denial of justice are avoided, and judicial protection is improved in various ways;
  - it also removes the anomaly under the current case-law that the greater the number of persons affected the less likely it is that effective judicial review is available;
  - the increasingly complex and unpredictable rules on standing are replaced by a much simpler test which would shift the emphasis in cases before the Community Courts from purely formal questions of admissibility to questions of substance;

- such a re-interpretation is in line with the general tendency of the case-law to extend the scope of judicial protection in response to the growth of powers of the Community institutions (ERTA, Les Verts, Chernobyl);
- (5) The objections to enlarging standing are unconvincing. In particular:
- the wording of Article 230 EC does not preclude it;
  - to insulate potentially unlawful measures from judicial scrutiny cannot be justified on grounds of administrative or legislative efficiency: protection of the legislative process must be achieved through appropriate substantive standards of review;
  - the fears of over-loading the Court of First Instance seem exaggerated since the time-limit in Article 230(5) EC and the requirement of direct concern will prevent an insuperable increase of the case-load; there are procedural means to deal with a more limited increase of cases.
- (6) The chief objection may be that the case-law has stood for many years. There are however a number of reasons why the time is now ripe for change. In particular:
- the case-law in many borderline cases is not stable, and has been in any event relaxed in recent years, with the result that decisions on admissibility have become increasingly complex and unpredictable;
  - the case-law is increasingly out of line with more liberal developments in the laws of the Member States;
  - the establishment of the Court of First Instance, and the progressive transfer to that Court of all actions brought by individuals, make it increasingly appropriate to enlarge the standing of individuals to challenge general measures;

- the Court's case-law on the principle of effective judicial protection in the national courts makes it increasingly difficult to justify narrow restrictions on standing before the Community Courts.

103 For all of those reasons I conclude that an individual should be regarded as individually concerned within the meaning of the fourth paragraph of Article 230 EC by a Community measure where, by reason of his particular circumstances, the measure has, or is liable to have, a substantial adverse effect on his interests.

I. Introduction

1. One remaining subject for examination by the Working Group is the question whether the current system of judicial remedies of individuals against acts of the institutions needs to be reformed in the light of the fundamental right to effective judicial protection as recognised by case-law of the Court of Justice and restated in Article 47 of the Charter<sup>1</sup>. As explained in doc. CONV 116/02, this issue has been subject to controversial debate among legal scholars and practitioners for quite some time independently of the Charter, although the drafting of the Charter has revived the discussion. CONV 116/02 also recalls the arguments of those who advocate liberalising the conditions of direct access of individuals to the Court of Justice (as currently laid down in Article 230 § 4 TEC), as well as of those arguing that the Community possesses, in principle, a complete system of remedies which provides effective judicial protection, according to circumstances, either through direct action in accordance with Article 230 § 4 TEC or through action in national courts which may - or even must - make a preliminary reference to the Court of Justice under Article 234 TEC.
2. Doc. CONV 116/02 further mentions a particular case which, under the current system of remedies, has meanwhile widely been recognised as problematic against the background of the fundamental right of effective judicial protection. That is the case of a "self-executing" Community regulation which imposes a directly applicable prohibition without the need for a national implementing act, thus forcing an individual wishing to assert his or her rights first to violate Community law and to appeal against the sanction which might be applied by national authorities against such a violation.<sup>2</sup> In its recent judgment "Jégo-Quéré"<sup>3</sup> concerning precisely such a case, the Court of First Instance, departing from the previous "Plaumann" case-law of the Court of Justice<sup>4</sup>, which it deemed too restrictive, admitted an action by an

<sup>1</sup> See point 3 of the Group's mandate (doc. CONV 72/02) and developed in further detail in document CONV 116 (Section II 6, especially (c), pp. 15 et seq.).

<sup>2</sup> It should be noted that the same situation may occur in Member States' laws. While according to some legal systems, individuals submitted to a prohibition by national laws or regulations are obliged to incur a sanction in order to seize a judge, other legal systems have devised alternative techniques permitting individuals to obtain a "preventive" judicial injunction or statement in order to protect their rights against the law or regulation in cause.

individual against a Community regulation, invoking the right to seize a judge. However, the Court of Justice, in its judgment of 25 July 2002 "Union de Pequeños Agricultores"<sup>5</sup>, confirmed its interpretation of Article 230 § 4 TEC and made it clear that, while it is possible to envisage a system of judicial review of the legality of Community measures of general application different from that established by the Treaty, it is for the Member States, if necessary, in accordance with Article 48 TEU, to reform the system currently in force.

3. Another issue examined in doc. CONV 116/02<sup>6</sup> which should be recalled without however needing further in-depth analysis in this paper, relates to the jurisdiction of the Court in the fields of Justice and Home affairs. While this issue goes beyond questions of fundamental rights and will therefore be treated in more detail in the newly constituted Working Group X, this group should take note of expert authority presented to it<sup>7</sup>, expressing concern about the current restrictions of jurisdiction of the Court in this area which is particularly sensitive to fundamental rights, including not least the risk that, whether or not the Union acceded to the ECHR, Union law and acts of the institutions in this area are exposed to appeal before the Strasbourg Court where the Court of Justice is prevented from exercising efficient control. The group may therefore wish to make a general comment, from a fundamental rights perspective, with regard to this issue.

II. Options for possible further action

4. On the basis of the above, the purpose of this paper is to present three main options for possible further action on Treaty level.

Option A: A special remedy based on alleged violations of fundamental rights ("Verfassungsbeschwerde"; "recurso de amparo")

<sup>7</sup> See the hearings of Judge Skouris (WD 19) and of Judge Fischbach on 17 September 2002; hearing of Mr. Schoo of 23 July 2002 (WD 13); WD 20 of Mr. Ben Fayot presenting a note by Advocate-General Francis Jacobs on this issue. See also WD 06 of Mrs. Paciotti.

5. This option, which has been proposed for quite some time and was mentioned in the report of the Court of Justice of May 1995 (prior to the Intergovernmental Conference leading to the Treaty of Amsterdam), would consist of the introduction of a new special action enabling individuals to challenge Community acts, including those of general application (i.e. of legislative or "regulatory" character), directly in the Court of Justice; the causes of action would however be limited to alleged violations of the applicants' fundamental rights. Models for such an action are to be found in the law of certain Member States such as Germany and Spain.
6. Advocates of that model argue that it would allow to leave intact the "normal" system of direct actions as established by Article 230 § 4 TEC focusing on individual acts of administrative character, and to add a special remedy of truly constitutional character. Critics however doubt notably whether it would be possible or convincing to distinguish alleged violations of fundamental rights from other violations of law serving as causes of action under Article 230 TEC. They point to experience in Germany suggesting that it is possible in almost all cases to express an alleged illegality also in terms of a fundamental rights violation, given the large scope of a number of fundamental rights in modern constitutional law (e.g., freedom of occupation or to conduct a business, property, respect for private life...). According to these critics, the relationship between such a special "constitutional" action and the ordinary system of remedies in Article 230 § 4 TEC could be difficult to establish, especially if the "constitutional" action were to be introduced directly before the Court of Justice and not before the Court of First Instance.<sup>8</sup>
7. For the sake of completeness, it should be recalled that possible accession to the European Convention on Human Rights would give individuals an additional judicial remedy based on fundamental rights, although by an external jurisdiction, against acts of the Union.

Option B: Amendment to Article 230 § 4 TEC:

8. A second option would be to amend the current wording of Article 230 § 4 TEC, in order to alleviate the rigidity currently resulting from the condition of "individual concern" in Article

---

<sup>8</sup> For these considerations, see also the points made by Judge Skouris at the hearing on 17 September 2002, WD N° 19.

230 § 4 TEC where an applicant wishes to challenge "self-executing" Community acts of general application.<sup>9</sup>

9. Several possibilities of wording have been proposed or could be conceived to that effect, as described below. One criterion for their appreciation by the group could be in how far they would in practice open up access to the Court of First Instance and therefore lead to a shift in the current division of tasks between the Community jurisdiction and national courts (according to which in most cases national courts, acting as "judges of Community law", scrutinise the legality of Community acts and, in case of doubt, are empowered or even obliged to make preliminary references under Article 234 TEC to the Court of Justice, whereas direct access to the Community Courts under Article 230 § 4 TEC is narrowly circumscribed). It should be stressed that valid arguments have been put forward both in favour of a stronger centralisation of judicial protection against Community acts at the level of the Community courts, and in favour of maintaining, in principle, the current division of work. Furthermore, some argue that enlarging too much the right of action under Article 230 § 4 TEC could open legislative acts to challenge by a vast number of individuals, whereas the law of several Member States protects legislation from such challenges and other Member States have established a special constitutional remedy ("Verfassungsbeschwerde", "recurso de amparo") covering legislative acts.<sup>10</sup>
10. a) A suggestion made by a Convention member is to convert the conditions of "direct" and "individual" concern in Article 230 § 4 TEC into alternative criteria (i.e. "direct or individual concern")<sup>11</sup>. A very similar result would be achieved by simple deletion of the words "...and individual..." in Article 230 § 4 TEC as proposed by another Convention Member<sup>12</sup>. It appears

<sup>9</sup> For proposals or arguments in that direction, see WD N° 17 by Jürgen Meyer; CONV 45/02 CONTRIB 25 by Hannes Farnleitner; Judge Skouris at the hearing on 17 September (WD N° 19); note from Advocate General Jacobs (see WD N° 20 of Mr. Fayot).

<sup>10</sup> An issue which would require careful consideration in case of a possible enlargement of direct access to the Court under Article 230 § 4 against acts of general application, but also in case of a possible "Verfassungsbeschwerde", would be how such enlarged direct remedies would relate to the case law on the Court of Justice according to which those who "without any doubt" could have challenged an act under Article 230 § 4 TEC but did not do so, can no longer invoke implicitly its illegality (Article 241) in further proceedings, see Case 92/78, Simmenthal, 1979 ECR 777, C-188/92, Textilwerke Deggendorf, 1994 ECR 833.

that this solution could lead to a rather significant opening-up of direct access of individuals to the Court of First Instance and thus to a shift in the present division of tasks.

11. b) Alternatively, one could think of an amendment leaving the basic structure of Article 230 § 4 TEC unchanged while adding language opening-up access exceptionally in cases of Community acts of general application where is no act of implementation against which the applicant could adequately seek judicial protection on national level. The test proposed by the Court of First Instance in the Jégo-Quéré judgment seems to be formulated with that intention<sup>13</sup>; yet it may be asked whether the limits proposed are sufficiently precise to provide guidance for the practice of the Court. A stricter and more objective formula would consist of adding, at the end of current Article 230 § 4 TEC, the words "or against an act of general application which is of direct concern to the applicant without calling for a measure of implementation" (..."contre un acte de portée générale qui la concernent directement sans comporter une mesure d'exécution"). In a similar vein, one could provide for direct actions against an act of general application which are of direct concern to the applicant "where there is no [adequate] remedy before a national court or tribunal".<sup>14</sup>
12. The aim of the latter formulae would be to preserve the global division of work between courts on European and on national level, and to remedy only such exceptional situations where currently there is no protection on either level.

Option C: Enshrining an obligation of Member States to provide for effective rights of action before their courts

<sup>13</sup> According to that test, an individual could seise the Court also (i.e., besides the case of individual acts) against a Community measure of general application "that concerns him (i.e. the applicant) directly if the measure in question affects his legal position, in a manner which is both definite and immediate, by restricting his rights or by imposing obligations on him".

<sup>14</sup> It should be born in mind that this formula could oblige the Community Courts to interpret, to a certain extent, national procedural law in particular cases (see the critical remark by Judge Skouris at the hearing of 17 September WD N° 19). It has also been observed that the Court already appreciates national procedural law, for example when judging whether a body qualifies as court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 234 or whether an action for compensation under Article 235 TEC might be barred because national rights of action providing an effective means of protection have not been exhausted, see Case 175/84, Krohn v. Commission, 1986 ECR 753.

13. Under this option, the rights of direct action of individuals before the European Courts would not be enlarged. Instead, the new constitutional treaty could contain a provision on the obligation of Member States to provide for remedies by their courts ensuring effective judicial protection for the rights guaranteed by Union law. A proposal in that sense is notably included in the contribution tabled by the European Ombudsman, Mr. Söderman.<sup>15</sup> Such a provision would merely codify existing case law of the European Court of Justice<sup>16</sup>. However, an express provision in the constitutional Treaty, thus enshrining the obligation of Member States to contribute to a complete system of judicial remedies in the European Union, would underline the Member States' responsibility in this area, while respecting the principle of procedural autonomy, and facilitate such reforms to the national procedural systems as may prove necessary. One could therefore hope that both a liberal interpretation by the Court of Article 230 § 4 TEC and evolutions in the national procedural systems may over time help eliminate existing lacunae in judicial protection against Community acts. It has also been argued that such a solution would best correspond to the principle of subsidiarity. On the other hand, it must be understood that such a Treaty provision might not necessarily permit to provide effective judicial protection in each individual case where a lacuna becomes manifest.

<sup>15</sup> See doc. CONV 221/02, Article "b", paragraph 2, of the Chapter on "Remedies". Attention is also drawn to the proposal made in this document to introduce a new action by the Ombudsman before the Court of Justice. This proposal is not analysed in detail here since it does not concern the right of individuals to judicial protection discussed in this paper.

<sup>16</sup> See judgment of 25 July 2002, pts. 41, 42: "It is for the Member States to establish a system of legal remedies and procedures which ensure respect for the right to effective judicial protection. In that context, in accordance with the principle of sincere cooperation laid down in Article 5 of the Treaty, national courts are required, so far as possible, to interpret and apply national procedural rules governing the exercise of rights of action in a way that enables natural and legal persons to challenge before the courts the legality of any decision or other national measure relative to the application to them of a Community act of general application, by pleading the invalidity of such an act." See also CFI, Case 172/98, Salamander etc. / Council and Parliament, pt. 74: "Pursuant to the principle of genuine cooperation set out in Article 5 of the Treaty, Member States must help to ensure that the system of legal remedies and procedures established by the EC Treaty and designed to permit the Community judicature to review the lawfulness of acts of the Community institutions is comprehensive."

PROJET DE CONSTITUTION DE L'UNION EUROPENNE

Une proposition basée sur les résolutions du Parlement européen

PRESENTATION

Ce document représente une tentative de traduire en texte cohérent les délibérations du Parlement européen en matière de Constitution de l'Union européenne et de réforme des Traités.

En synthèse, en suivant les indications qui résultent des résolutions successives adoptées par le Parlement européen, nous avons essayé d'intégrer dans un texte unique les normes à caractère constitutionnel contenues dans les Traités en vigueur, en y apportant les innovations souhaitées par le Parlement.

Ce document veut représenter la première partie d'un nouveau traité de l'Union - la Constitution de l'Union européenne - dont la deuxième partie devrait se composer de toutes les autres normes, coordonnées de la même façon dans un texte unique consolidé des Traités en vigueur.

Ce texte contient beaucoup d'éléments nouveaux : la Charte des droits fondamentaux est incorporée dans le texte de la Constitution ; la distinction entre Communauté et Union disparaît ; le système institutionnel est simplifié et clarifié ; les procédures de révision de la Constitution et du Traité sont différenciées.

Nous avons cependant dû renoncer à toute autre proposition innovatrice utile à la rédaction d'un texte constitutionnel autonome, en l'absence de résolutions appropriées du Parlement européen.

Il ne s'agit donc pas de la proposition d'une personne ni d'un groupe politique, mais d'un exercice technique de traduction en pratique de propositions qui ont déjà été votées avec une très large majorité par le Parlement européen.

Le résultat peut constituer un instrument utile pour rendre plus spécifique et concrète la discussion en cours sur une future Constitution de l'Union européenne et peut ainsi contribuer aux travaux de la Convention sur l'avenir de l'Europe.

Ce projet voit le jour avec une initiative d'Elena Paciotti, députée au Parlement européen et présidente de la Fondazione Basso, qui a coordonné les travaux. Le texte a été rédigé par Federico Petrangeli, de l'Université de Milan, et Valentina Bazzocchi, de l'Université de Bologne. Le texte a été discuté par les membres de l'Observatoire sur l'Europe de la Fondazione Basso, qui ont fait des suggestions et donné des impulsions. La version française a été éditée par Ludovica Zagrebelsky.

N.B.:

Le point de départ de ce travail est le texte consolidé des Traités modifiés à la lumière du Traité de Nice : sont indiquées en note les références ponctuelles. Le caractère italique gras met en évidence les modifications proposées par le Parlement européen : les résolutions en question sont indiquées en note avec la date d'adoption, le titre et le nom du rapporteur. Le caractère italique met en évidence les modifications introduites par les auteurs pour des raisons de coordination.

TITRE I

LA CHARTE DES DROITS FONDAMENTAUX DE L'UNION<sup>9</sup>

PRÉAMBULE

Les peuples de l'Europe, en établissant entre eux une union sans cesse plus étroite, ont décidé de partager un avenir pacifique fondé sur des valeurs communes.

Consciente de son patrimoine spirituel et moral, l'Union se fonde sur les valeurs indivisibles et universelles de dignité humaine, de liberté, d'égalité et de solidarité ; elle repose sur le principe de la démocratie et de l'Etat de droit. Elle place la personne au cœur de son action en instituant la citoyenneté de l'Union et en créant un espace de liberté, de sécurité et de justice.

L'Union contribue à la préservation et au développement de ces valeurs communes dans le respect de la diversité des cultures et des traditions des peuples de l'Europe, ainsi que de l'identité nationale des Etats membres et de l'organisation de leurs pouvoirs publics au niveau national, régional et local ; elle cherche à promouvoir un développement équilibré et durable et assure la libre circulation des personnes, des biens, des services et des capitaux, ainsi que la liberté d'établissement.

A cette fin, il est nécessaire, en les rendant plus visibles dans une Charte, de renforcer la protection des droits fondamentaux à la lumière de l'évolution de la société, du progrès social et des développements scientifiques et technologiques.

La présente Charte réaffirme, dans le respect des compétences et des tâches de l'Union<sup>10</sup>, ainsi que du principe de subsidiarité, les droits qui résultent notamment des traditions constitutionnelles et des obligations internationales communes aux Etats membres, de cette Constitution et du Traité, de la Convention européenne de sauvegarde des droits de l'homme et des libertés fondamentales, des Chartes sociales adoptées par la Communauté et par le Conseil de l'Europe, ainsi que de la jurisprudence de la Cour de justice des [Communautés européennes]<sup>11</sup> et de la Cour européenne des droits de l'homme.

La jouissance de ces droits entraîne des responsabilités et des devoirs tant à l'égard d'autrui qu'à l'égard de la communauté humaine et des générations futures.

En conséquence, l'Union reconnaît les droits, les libertés et les principes énoncés ci-après.

- a) l'espace de l'action prévue dépasse les limites d'un Etat membre et l'action comporterait des risques d'effets contraires, en termes de distorsion et déséquilibre pour un ou plusieurs Etats, si elle n'était pas gérée au niveau communautaire ;*
- b) l'action prévue au niveau communautaire, par rapport aux actions semblables qui seraient mises en œuvre séparément par chaque Etat membre, présente un avantage de synergie tangible en termes d'efficacité et d'économie d'échelle ;*
- c) l'action prévue répond à une exigence de solidarité ou de cohésion qui, à la lumière des différences de développement, ne peut être assumée de façon satisfaisante dans le cadre de chaque Etat membre.*

4. Chacune des institutions assure, dans l'exercice de ses compétences, le respect des principes de subsidiarité et de proportionnalité, selon les dispositions et procédures prévues par le Traité<sup>30</sup>.

Article 64. Les compétences communes de l'Union et des Etats membres<sup>32</sup>

Le texte est tiré de la proposition présentée par la Commission à la Conférence intergouvernementale de Nice.

TITRE IX COOPERATION RENFORCEE

Article 113. Conditions générales<sup>137</sup>

1. Les Etats membres qui se proposent d'instaurer entre eux une coopération renforcée peuvent recourir aux institutions, procédures et mécanismes prévus par la Constitution et par le Traité, à condition que la coopération envisagée :

- b) reste dans les limites des compétences de l'Union et ne concerne pas des matières qui sont de compétence exclusive de l'Union ;
- c) ne nuise ni au marché intérieur ni à la cohésion économique et sociale
- d) respecte les compétences, les droits et les obligations des Etats membres qui n'y participent pas ;
- e) soit ouverte à tous les Etats membres, conformément au point 3 du présent article.

2. Dans le secteur de la politique étrangère et de sécurité commune les coopérations renforcées concernent la mise en œuvre d'une action commune ou d'une position commune. Elles peuvent concerner des questions qui ont des implications militaires ou dans le secteur de la défense<sup>138</sup>.

3. Les coopérations renforcées ne sont utilisées qu'en dernier ressort, lorsqu'il a été établi par le Conseil que les objectifs qui leur sont assignés ne peuvent être atteints, dans un délai raisonnable, en appliquant les dispositions pertinentes du Traité.

4. Lors de leur instauration, les coopérations renforcées sont ouvertes à tous les Etats membres. La participation à une coopération renforcée reste possible à tout moment, sous réserve de respecter la décision initiale ainsi que les décisions prises dans ce cadre. La Commission et les Etats membres qui participent à une coopération renforcée veillent à encourager la participation du plus grand nombre possible d'Etats membres.

Article 114. Mise en œuvre de la coopération renforcée<sup>139</sup>

1. Aux fins de l'adoption des actes et des décisions nécessaires à la mise en œuvre de la coopération renforcée, les dispositions pertinentes du Traité s'appliquent. Toutefois, alors que tous les membres du Conseil peuvent participer aux délibérations, seuls ceux qui représentent des Etats membres participant à la coopération renforcée prennent part à l'adoption des décisions. La majorité qualifiée dans ce cadre est celle de l'art. 80, qui ne prend en compte que les Etats membres concernés.<sup>140</sup>

2. Les Etats membres appliquent, dans la mesure où ils sont concernés, les actes et décisions pris pour la mise en œuvre de la coopération renforcée à laquelle ils participent. De tels actes et décisions ne lient que les Etats membres qui y participent et ne sont, le cas échéant, directement applicables que dans ces Etats. Les Etats membres ne participant pas à la coopération renforcée n'entravent pas sa mise en œuvre par les Etats membres qui y participent.

3. Les dépenses résultant de la mise en œuvre d'une coopération renforcée, autres que les coûts administratifs occasionnés pour les institutions, sont à la charge des Etats membres qui y participent, à moins que le Conseil, statuant à l'unanimité de tous ses membres après avis conforme<sup>141</sup> du Parlement européen, n'en décide autrement.

4. Le Conseil et la Commission assurent la cohérence des actions entreprises sur la base du présent titre, ainsi que la cohérence de ces actions avec les politiques de l'Union, et coopèrent à cet effet.

TITRE X DISPOSITIONS FINALES

Article 115. Adhésion à l'Union<sup>142</sup>

1. Tout Etat européen qui respecte les principes de la Constitution peut demander à devenir membre de l'Union. Il adresse sa demande au Conseil, lequel se prononce à l'unanimité, après consultation de la Commission et avis conforme du Parlement européen, qui statue à la majorité absolue des membres qui le composent.

2. Les conditions de l'admission, et les adaptations éventuelles du Traité que cette admission entraîne en ce qui concerne les traités sur lesquels est fondée l'Union, font l'objet d'un accord entre les Etats membres et l'Etat demandeur. Ledit accord est soumis à la ratification par tous les Etats contractants, conformément à leurs règles constitutionnelles respectives.

Article 116. Suspension des droits d'un Etat membre<sup>143</sup>

1. Sur proposition motivée d'un tiers des Etats membres, du Parlement européen ou de la Commission, le Conseil, statuant à la majorité des quatre cinquièmes de ses membres après avis conforme du Parlement européen, peut constater l'existence évidente d'un risque de violation grave de la part d'un Etat membre d'un ou de plusieurs principes de la Constitution et lui adresser les recommandations appropriées. Avant de procéder à cette constatation le Conseil écoute l'Etat membre en question et, statuant selon la même procédure, peut demander à des personnalités indépendantes de présenter dans un délai raisonnable un rapport sur la situation de l'Etat membre en question.

Le Conseil vérifie régulièrement si les motifs qui l'ont conduit à cette constatation restent d'actualité.

2. Le Conseil, réuni au niveau des chefs d'Etat et de gouvernement et statuant à l'unanimité, sur proposition d'un tiers des Etats membres ou de la Commission et après avis conforme du Parlement européen, peut constater l'existence d'une violation grave et persistante par un Etat membre des principes de la Constitution, après avoir invité le gouvernement de l'Etat membre en question à présenter ses observations<sup>144</sup>.

3. Lorsqu'une telle constatation est faite, le Conseil, statuant à la majorité qualifiée, peut décider de suspendre certains droits découlant de l'application de la Constitution et du Traité à l'Etat membre en question, y compris le droit de vote du représentant du gouvernement de cet Etat au Conseil. Ce faisant, le Conseil tient compte des conséquences éventuelles d'une telle suspension sur les droits et obligations des personnes physiques ou morales.

Les obligations qui incombent à l'Etat membre en question au titre de la Constitution et du Traité restent en tout état de cause contraignantes pour cet Etat.

4. Le Conseil, statuant à la majorité qualifiée, peut décider par la suite de modifier les mesures prises au titre du paragraphe 2 ou d'y mettre fin pour répondre à des changements de la situation qui l'a conduit à imposer ces mesures.

5. Aux fins du présent article, le Conseil statue sans tenir compte du vote du représentant du gouvernement de l'Etat membre en question ? Les abstentions des membres présents ou représentés ne font pas obstacle à l'adoption des décisions visées au paragraphe 1.

Le présent paragraphe s'applique également en cas de suspension des droits de vote conformément au paragraphe 2.

6. Aux fins du présent article, le Parlement européen statue à la majorité des deux tiers des voix exprimées, représentant une majorité de ses membres.

Article 117. Procédure de révision de la Constitution<sup>145</sup>

1. Le gouvernement de tout Etat membre, le Parlement européen ou la Commission peuvent proposer des projets tendant à modifier la Constitution.

Si le Conseil, après avoir consulté, le cas échéant, le Parlement européen et la Commission, émet un avis favorable, les projets sont soumis à une Convention, qui se compose d'un représentant pour chaque chef d'Etat et de gouvernement, de deux représentants pour chacun des Parlements nationaux, d'un nombre de membres du Parlement européen égal à celui des représentants des chefs d'Etat de gouvernement, et de deux représentants de la Commission.

La Convention rédige son propre règlement et élit en son sein son propre Président.

3. Les propositions de modifications élaborées par la Convention sont approuvées à la majorité des quatre cinquièmes de ses membres par une conférence des représentants des gouvernements des Etats membres, convoquée par le Président du Conseil<sup>146</sup>.

4. Lorsque les modifications auront été ratifiées par une majorité des Etats membres dont la population constitue les deux tiers de la population totale de l'Union, les gouvernements des Etats membres qui auront ratifié se réuniront immédiatement pour décider d'un commun accord et avec l'avis conforme du Parlement européen les procédures et la date d'entrée en vigueur des nouvelles dispositions constitutionnelles et les relations à établir dans ce domaine avec les autres Etats membres<sup>147</sup>.

1. Le gouvernement de tout Etat membre, le Parlement européen ou la Commission peuvent proposer des projets tendant à modifier le Traité.
2. Si le Conseil, après avis conforme du Parlement européen<sup>149</sup>, et, le cas échéant, après avoir consulté la Commission, émet un avis favorable à la convocation d'une conférence des représentants des gouvernements des Etats membres, celle-ci est convoquée par le Président du Conseil pour établir, avec le vote de la majorité des deux tiers de ses membres, les modifications à apporter au Traité. Dans le cas où il s'agirait de modifications institutionnelles dans le secteur monétaire, la Banque centrale européenne est consultée.
3. Les amendements entrent en vigueur lorsqu'ils ont été ratifiés par une majorité des Etats membres dont la population représente les deux tiers de la population totale de l'Union<sup>150</sup>.

Members of the Group will find herein compromise proposals by the Chairman for drafting adjustments in the horizontal articles of the Charter (in English and French), and accompanying explanatory notes.

Compromise proposals by the Chairman for adjustments in the horizontal articles:

In Article 51 (1):

"The provisions of this Charter are addressed to the institutions and bodies of the Union with due regard for the principle of subsidiarity and to the Member States only when they are implementing Union law. They shall therefore respect the rights, observe the principles and promote the application thereof in accordance with their respective powers and respecting the limits of the powers of the Union as conferred on it by other parts of [this Treaty / the Constitutional Treaty]."

Article 51 (2):

"This Charter does not extend the scope of application of Union law or establish any new power or task for the Community or the Union or modify powers and tasks defined by the other [Chapters / parts] of [this Treaty / the Constitutional Treaty]."

Add to Article 52:

"52(4) Insofar as the Charter recognises fundamental rights as they result from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States, those rights shall be interpreted in harmony with those traditions."

"52 (5) The provisions of this Charter which contain principles may be implemented by legislative and executive acts taken by institutions and bodies of the Union, and by acts of Member States only when they are implementing Union law, in the exercise of their respective powers. They shall be judicially cognisable only in the interpretation of such acts and in the ruling on their legality."

"52 (6) Full account shall be taken of national laws and practices as specified in this Charter."

Propositions de compromis du Président pour des adaptations dans les dispositions horizontales:

Article 51 (1):

"Les dispositions de la présente Charte s'adressent aux institutions et organes de l'Union dans le respect du principe de subsidiarité, ainsi qu'aux Etats membres uniquement lorsqu'ils mettent en oeuvre le droit de l'Union. En conséquence, ils respectent les droits, observent les principes et en promeuvent l'application, conformément à leurs compétences respectives et dans le respect des limites des compétences de l'Union telles qu'elle lui sont conférées par les autres parties du [présent traité/traité constitutionnel]."

Article 51 (2):

La présente Charte n'étend pas le champ d'application du droit de l'Union, ni ne crée aucune compétence ni aucune tâche nouvelle pour la Communauté et pour l'Union et ne modifie pas les compétences et tâches définies par les autres chapitres du [présent traité/traité constitutionnel].

Ajouter à l'article 52:

"52(4) Dans la mesure où la présente Charte reconnaît des droits fondamentaux tels qu'ils résultent des traditions constitutionnelles communes aux Etats membres, ces droits doivent être interprétés en harmonie avec les dites traditions."

"52 (5) Les dispositions de la présente Charte qui contiennent des principes peuvent être mises en œuvre par des actes législatifs et exécutifs pris par les institutions et organes de l'Union, et par des actes des Etats membres uniquement lorsqu'ils mettent en œuvre le droit de l'Union, dans l'exercice de leurs compétences respectives. Leur invocation devant le juge n'est admise que pour l'interprétation et le contrôle de la légalité de tels actes."

"52(6) Les législations et pratiques nationales doivent être pleinement prises en compte comme précisé dans la présente Charte."

Explanatory notes:

1. The present compromise proposals aim at taking due account of concerns raised and suggestions made in the discussions of the Group and in working documents, in particular documents n° 1 by Mr. McDonagh, n°s 4 and 16 by Baroness Scotland, and n° 14 by Mr. MacCormick. They have been drafted in the spirit of respecting fully the compromise reached by the previous Convention on the content of the Charter, while achieving greater clarity of certain elements of that compromise, which according to certain members of the Group would be desirable in the event of a Charter becoming legally binding.
2. The proposed adjustments to Article 51 (1) and (2) are designed to reflect the outcome of the Group's discussions on the relationship between the Charter and the allocation of competences between the Union and the Member States. The words "(this Charter) does not extend the scope of application of Union law..." merely confirm established case law<sup>1</sup>.
3. The suggested paragraph 4 in Article 52 serves to ensure an interpretation of the Charter which is in harmony with the common constitutional traditions; this rule of interpretation is based on current Treaty language (Article 6 § 2 TEU) and takes due account of the approach to common constitutional traditions followed by the Court of Justice, as explained by Judge Skouris at the hearing of 17 September.
4. The proposal of a new Article 52 (5) confirms the distinction between rights and principles which has been an important element - already expressed in the Preamble and in Article 51 (1) - of the final compromise of the Charter. It attempts to encapsulate, in a clear legal definition, the understanding of the concept of "principles" which has marked the work of the previous Convention on this point and been mentioned in the discussions of the Working Group by members of that Convention. Principles are different from subjective rights in that they may call for implementation through legislative or executive acts; accordingly, they become significant for the Courts when such acts are interpreted or reviewed. This is consonant both with case law of the Court of Justice<sup>2</sup> and with the approach of the Member States' constitutional systems to "principles" particularly in the field of social law, as developed in the previous Convention by several eminent constitutional lawyers who were members of that Convention.

In addition, the proposed clause would maintain the line followed by the previous Convention to express the character of a "right" or a "principle" of individual Charter articles as best as possible in the wording of the respective articles and to leave it, on this basis and taking into account the valuable guidance provided by the "Praesidium's Explanations", for future jurisprudence to rule on the exact attribution of articles to the two categories.

Members of the Group will find herein comments on horizontal articles of the Charter

Comments on some of the points to be discussed by the Working Group on Charter at its meeting on 7 October 2002
by
VYTENIS POVILAS ANDRIUKAITIS,
Member of the Convention

Based on the premise that the substance of the Charter as a compromise reached by the previous Convention should be respected, the horizontal articles of the Charter is the main part that we need to focus our attention on.

Therefore, I congratulate President António Vitorino on an excellent drafting of the compromise proposals concerning adjustments in the horizontal articles of the Charter both accommodating the concerns of some of the members of our Working Group and reflecting the broad discussions that took place in the Working Group meetings. I support the proposals by Mr. António Vitorino.

I would also like to express my support to Prof. Jürgen Meyer's proposal laid down in Working document No. 17 on the Enforceability of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and improvement of the individual's right to legal redress. I support the proposed amendment of Article 230 (4) EC aimed at enlarging standing for individuals to enable them to challenge general measures that are of direct or individual concern to them. I share the view that the present wording of the Article which requires that the challenged measure be of direct and individual concern to the applicant is too restrictive. It is fully understood that as a consequence of such an amendment the division of work between the national and the European courts may be disturbed. However, by broadening-up direct access to the Court of First Instance, we may ensure both individuals' right of access to a court and their right to an effective remedy at the European level. Moreover, that the recent case-law of the Court of Justice and the Court of First Instance invite us to initiate necessary treaty amendments. It is an opportunity that we do have. Therefore, I welcome Prof. Jürgen Meyer's proposal and would like to invite the Working Group to take it into account.

Members of the Group will find herewith the draft final report of the Group.

Members are kindly asked to send any reactions they may have to this draft to the Secretariat (clemens.ladenburger@consilium.eu.int) by Thursday, 17 October, 17:00 hours, at the latest.

Draft Final Report

Introduction

On the basis of its mandate (doc. CONV 72/02), the Group has, in the course of its seven meetings and having held hearings with several legal experts<sup>1</sup>, examined two main complementary issues:

- the modalities and consequences of possible incorporation of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (hereinafter: "the Charter") into the Treaties (Chapter A);
- the modalities and consequences of possible accession of the Community / the Union to the European Convention on Human Rights (hereinafter: "the ECHR") (Chapter B).

In addition, the Group has discussed the specific issue of access by individuals to the Court of Justice, which, as mentioned in the Group's mandate, arises independently of the questions of incorporation of the Charter and of accession to the ECHR but has a wider link to fundamental rights (Chapter C).

Thanks to the strong sense of commitment, the willingness to engage in detailed technical discussion, and the remarkable spirit of compromise of its members, the Group has succeeded in producing a highly consensual report on both main issues.

A. On the Charter

I. Recommendations as to the form of possible incorporation of the Charter

1. General recommendation

At the outset, the Group stresses that, in accordance with its mandate, the final political decision

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Johann Schoo, Director, Legal Service of the Parliament, Mr. Jean-Claude Piris, Jurisconsult, Director-General of the Legal Service of the Council, and Mr. Michel Petite, Director-General of the Legal Service of the Commission, heard on 23 July (see WD N° 13 and CONV 223/02); Mr. Marc Fischbach, Judge, European Court of Human Rights, and Mr. Vassilios Skouris, Judge, European Court of Justice, heard on 17 September (see WD N° 19 and CONV 295/02). Mr. Söderman, European Ombudsman and observer to the Convention, attended the Group's meeting on 4th October and presented his contribution CONV 221/02 CONTRIB 76.

about possible incorporation of the Charter into the Treaty Framework will be reserved for the Convention Plenary. The mandate of the Group has been to prepare such a decision through examination of a series of specific questions relating to modalities and consequences of such incorporation.

Without prejudice to that final political decision, and on the basis of the common understanding reached by the Group on all key issues related to the Charter as set out below, all members of the Group either support strongly or are open to giving favourable consideration to an incorporation of the Charter in a form which would make the Charter legally binding and give it constitutional status. Different forms exist, in the Group's view, to achieve that result, as set out below; but in any event, a "building block" as central as fundamental rights should find its place in the Union's constitutional framework. The Group is confident that, with its report, the necessary groundwork allowing the Plenary to take its political decision on incorporation has now been done; notably, this general recommendation of the Group has been facilitated by a common understanding, reached within the Group, on certain legal and technical aspects of the Charter which are of great significance for a smooth incorporation ensuring legal certainty.

2. Recommendations as to the concrete form of incorporation

The Group is fully aware that the choice to make as to the concrete form of incorporation does not depend exclusively on considerations linked to the Charter or to fundamental rights in general, but also on the overall picture of the Treaty architecture which will emerge in future discussions of the Convention Plenary. For this reason, it would not be appropriate for this Group to restrict the Convention's further overall work by proposing only one technique for incorporation of the Charter. Rather, out of the various possibilities submitted to the Group at the outset of its work<sup>1</sup>, the Group recommends the Plenary to consider two basic options:

- a. insertion of the text of the Charter articles at the beginning of the Constitutional Treaty, in a Title or Chapter of that Treaty; or

- b. insertion of an appropriate reference to the Charter in one article of the Constitutional Treaty; such a reference could be combined with annexing the Charter to the Constitutional Treaty, either as a specific part of the Constitutional Treaty containing only the Charter or as a separate legal text (e.g., in form of a Protocol).

Having considered the questions coming under the Group's mandate, a large majority of the Group would prefer the first option. The second option is favoured by certain other members, some of them emphasising the need to annex the Charter to the Treaty, as a specific part of that Treaty or as a protocol. The Group as a whole underlines that both basic options can serve to make the Charter a legally binding text of constitutional status.

II. Conclusions and recommendations on certain legal and technical aspects of the Charter of importance for a smooth incorporation of the Charter into the new Treaty architecture

An important part of the Group's work has been to examine a number of legal and technical aspects of the Charter which, as has become clear during the Group's discussions, are important in the perspective of a smooth incorporation of the Charter, as a legally binding document, into the new Treaty architecture. The Group has found a common understanding on these questions, and on ensuing recommendations, as set out hereafter.

1. Respecting the content of the Charter

The basic starting point underlying the Group's conclusions on the Charter is that the content of the Charter represented a consensus reached by the previous Convention, a body which had special expertise in fundamental rights and served as model for the present Convention, and endorsed by the Nice European Council. The whole Charter - including its statements of rights and principles, its preamble and, as a crucial element, its "general provisions" - should therefore be respected by this Convention and not be re-opened by it.

Accordingly, the Group has not considered any changes to the rights and principles contained in the Charter. The Group recognises however that certain technical drafting adjustments in the Charter's "general provisions" are nonetheless possible and appropriate as explained below; the Group therefore proposes to the Plenary the drafting adjustments set out in the Annex to this report<sup>1</sup>. It is important to note that these adjustments proposed by the Group do not reflect modifications of substance. On the contrary, they would serve to confirm, and render absolutely clear and legally watertight, certain key elements of the overall consensus on the Charter on which the previous Convention had already agreed. They are prompted by the new perspective of a Constitutional Treaty which has arisen in the present Convention, but also by the concern of legal certainty in the field of fundamental rights, to which the Charter is designed to contribute. Thus, all drafting adjustments proposed herein fully respect the basic premise of the Group's work, i.e. to leave intact the substance agreed by consensus within the previous Convention, and the Group urges the Plenary equally to respect this premise when considering the proposed drafting adjustments.

2. Incorporation of the Charter will not modify the allocation of competences between the Union and the Member States

The Group is able to confirm that incorporation of the Charter will in no way modify the allocation of competences between the Union and the Member States. This point, on which there was consensus already in the previous Convention, is currently reflected in Article 51 § 2 of the Charter. The fact that certain Charter rights concern areas in which the Union has little or no competence to act is not in contradiction to it, given that, although the Union's competences are limited, it must respect all fundamental rights wherever it acts and therefore avoid indirect interference also with such fundamental rights on which it would not have the competence to legislate.

However, in order to render this point clear beyond any doubt, even in the perspective of a Charter forming part of a constitutional treaty, the Group recommends the drafting adjustments to Article 51 § 1 and 2 set out in the Annex. Moreover, the Group considers it useful to confirm expressly, in Article 51 § 2, the established case law according to which the fundamental rights of the Union, while they must be respected, cannot in themselves have the effect of extending the scope of the

<sup>1</sup> In addition to the adjustments indicated in the annex, it should be kept in mind that, depending on the future Treaty architecture, purely drafting adjustments may become necessary to the various references, made throughout the Charter, to "the Treaties", "the Community Treaties", "the Treaty on the European Union", "Community law", etc., see doc. CONV 116/02, p. 7.

Treaty provisions beyond the competences of the Union.<sup>1</sup>

Furthermore, the Group recalls in this context that the Charter was drafted with due regard to the principle of subsidiarity, as is clear from its Preamble, its Article 51 § 1 and from those Charter Articles which make references to national laws and practices; it seems appropriate to the Group to include a clause in the general provisions of the Charter (see Article 52 § 6 in the Annex) recalling these references. Likewise, it is in line with the principle of subsidiarity that the scope of application of the Charter is limited, in accordance with its Article 51 § 1, to the institutions and bodies of the Union, and to Member States only when they are implementing Union law.<sup>2</sup>

3. Full compatibility between the fundamental rights of the EC Treaty and the Charter articles which restate them

As regards the specific case of those fundamental rights which are already expressly enshrined in the EC Treaty and merely "restated" in the Charter (notably rights derived from Union citizenship)<sup>3</sup>, there was already consensus in the previous Convention on the principle that the legal situation as defined by the EC Treaty should remain unaffected by the Charter; this is presently expressed in the "referral clause" of Article 52 § 2 of the Charter<sup>4</sup>.

Reconfirming that point, the Group has reached consensus on the need to have, as concerns these rights, a legally "watertight" referral clause, such as presently included in Article 52 § 2 of the Charter, ensuring complete compatibility and coordination between the statements of the rights in the Charter and their more detailed regulation as currently found in the EC Treaty. The Group stresses that this clause of Article 52 § 2 will, if the Charter is to become a part of the constitutional treaty, logically need a slight drafting adjustment, so as to make it clear that the referral is made to other parts of Treaty law where the conditions and limits of the exercise of these rights are defined. The concrete formula of such a drafting adjustment, reflecting that principle of compatibility and coordination, cannot be given at this stage as it will depend on the exact overall Treaty architecture.

<sup>2</sup> It should be noted that, upon possible incorporation of the Charter into the Treaty, the current wording of Article 46 (d) TEU would have to be brought in line with existing case law and Article 51 of the Charter on the (limited) application of fundamental rights to acts of Member States.

<sup>4</sup> See also the "Explanations" (Document CHARTE 4473/00 CONVENT 49 of 11 October 2000; see in detail below, section A III 3) under Article 52 § 2: "The Charter does not alter the system of rights

Furthermore, the Group is of the view that, as regards these rights, a certain "replication" ("dédouplements") between the Charter and other parts of Treaty law will be inevitable for legal reasons and will not be harmful.

The Group signals that if, as advocated by a large majority of the Group, incorporation is achieved by the insertion of the Charter text in the first part of the Constitutional Treaty, it would then become necessary to combine, in an appropriate manner, in that Treaty the Charter articles on citizens' rights and the provisions on citizenship of the EC Treaty having constitutional importance; this should be considered as a technical operation raising no political problems.

4. Correspondence between Charter rights and rights guaranteed by the ECHR

The Group underlines and reconfirms the central importance of Article 52 § 3 of the Charter, on those Charter rights which correspond to rights guaranteed by the ECHR; it recalls that this clause was a crucial element of the overall consensus in the previous Convention.<sup>1</sup> On the basis of the "Explanations" on the Charter<sup>2</sup>, the Group confirms its common understanding on the meaning of this provision: the rights in the Charter which correspond to ECHR rights have the same scope and meaning as laid down in the ECHR; this includes notably the detailed provisions in the ECHR which permit limitations of these rights. The second sentence of Article 52 § 3 of the Charter serves to clarify that this article does not prevent more extensive protection (i) in Union legislation and (ii) in those articles of the Charter which, although based on the ECHR, go beyond the ECHR because Union law acquis had already reached a higher level of protection (e.g., Article 47 on effective judicial protection, or Article 50 on the right not to be punished twice for the same offence).

5. An interpretation in harmony with common constitutional traditions

The Group stresses that the Charter has deep roots in the Member States' common constitutional traditions, which were brought together impressively in the previous Convention's work. The extensive case law on fundamental rights derived from the common constitutional traditions established by the Court of Justice and confirmed by Article 6 § 2 TEU, represents an important conferred by the Treaties".

<sup>1</sup> Cf. on Article 52 § 3 of the Charter also the concurrent statements made by Judge Fischbach of the European Court of Human Rights and Judge Skouris of the European Court of Justice at the hearing on 17 September, doc. CONV 295/02.

source for the rights recognised by the Charter. In order to highlight these roots and in the interest of a smooth incorporation of the Charter as a legally binding document, the Group proposes to include a rule of interpretation in the general provisions (see Article 52 § 4 in the Annex). The rule is based on the wording of the current Article 6 § 2 TEU and takes due account of the approach to common constitutional traditions followed by the Court of Justice as explained by Judge Skouris at the hearing of 17 September. Under that rule, rather than following a rigid approach of "a lowest common denominator", the Charter rights concerned should be interpreted in a way offering a high standard of protection which is adequate for the law of the Union and in harmony with the common constitutional traditions.

6. The distinction between "rights" and "principles" in the Charter

The Group stresses the importance of the distinction between "rights" and "principles", which was an important element – already expressed in the Preamble and in Article 51 § 1 of the Charter - of the consensus reached by the previous Convention. In order to reconfirm that distinction while increasing legal certainty in the perspective of a legally binding Charter with constitutional status, the Group proposes an additional general provision (see Article 51 § 5 in the Annex) encapsulating, in a clear legal definition, the understanding of the concept of "principles" which marked the work of the previous Convention and has been recalled in the discussions of the Working Group by members of that Convention. According to that understanding, principles are different from subjective rights in that they may call for implementation through legislative or executive acts; accordingly, they become significant for the Courts when such acts are interpreted or reviewed. This is consistent both with case law of the Court of Justice<sup>1</sup> and with the approach of the Member States' constitutional systems to "principles" particularly in the field of social law.

In addition, with the proposed clause the Group reconfirms the line followed by the previous Convention to express the character ("right" or "principle") of individual Charter articles as best as possible in the wording of the respective articles and to leave it, on this basis and taking into account the valuable guidance provided by the "Praesidium's Explanations", for future jurisprudence to rule on the exact attribution of articles to the two categories.

Megret, tome 3, pp. 80 et seq.

III. Recommendations concerning further questions arising in the context of possible incorporation

1. Preamble of the Charter:

The Group considers the Charter Preamble as a crucial element of the overall consensus on the Charter reached by the previous Convention. The Group therefore recommends that this element should in any event be preserved in the future Constitutional Treaty framework. The Group also recalls that the Charter Preamble comprises language on the fundamental nature of the Union going well beyond the area of fundamental rights. As is the case with the Charter as a whole, the concrete form of an "incorporation of the Charter Preamble" into the Treaty framework, as recommended by the Group, will equally depend on the overall Treaty structure to be defined by the Plenary. Thus, if the Charter articles were to be inserted directly in the Constitutional Treaty, the Charter Preamble, enriched by further elements as appropriate, should in the Group's view be used as the Preamble to the Constitutional Treaty. If in turn the Charter is incorporated as a specific part of the Constitutional Treaty or as a separate binding legal text (e.g., in the form of a Protocol) within the Union's constitutional architecture, the Charter Preamble could remain attached to the text of the Charter without any changes; that would of course not preclude the Convention from using, for the drafting of the new Treaty preamble, the elements of general importance to be found in the Charter preamble.

2. Continued reference to external sources (such as currently found in Article 6 § 2 TEU):

The Group discussed whether or not, in case of incorporation of the Charter, the Constitutional Treaty should also contain a reference to the two external sources of inspiration for fundamental rights as currently made in Article 6 § 2 TEU, i.e. the ECHR and the constitutional traditions common to the Member States. Valid arguments have been advanced both for and against this.

Some members have taken the view that maintaining such a reference would be redundant and create legal confusion, given that the Charter already includes rights derived from the ECHR and the common constitutional traditions and makes references to these sources. Others have argued that such a reference in the Constitutional Treaty could serve to complete the protection offered by the Charter and clarify that Union law is open for future evolutions in ECHR and Member States' human rights law.

In any event, the Group recognises that this question is closely related to the choice of the form of incorporation which the Convention will have to make. The Group therefore refrains from making a firm recommendation on this issue; instead, it limits itself to stating that such a reference, if appropriately drafted<sup>1</sup>, is not excluded by the prospect of a legally binding Charter, and signals the issue to the Plenary for consideration.

3. The importance of the "Explanations":

The Group stresses the importance of the "Explanations ", drawn up at the instigation of the Praesidium of the previous Convention<sup>2</sup>, as an important tool of interpretation ensuring a correct understanding of the Charter. It recognises that these Explanations are presently not sufficiently accessible for legal practitioners. The Group recommends therefore that, upon possible incorporation of the Charter, attention be drawn in an appropriate manner to these Explanations which, as they themselves state, have no legal value but are intended to clarify the provisions of the Charter. In particular, it would be important to publicise them more widely. To the extent that the Convention takes on board the drafting adjustments proposed by this Group, the corresponding explanations given in this report should be added to the original Explanations.

4. Procedure for future amendment of the Charter

As a consequence of possible incorporation of the Charter into the Constitutional Treaty framework, the question will arise according to which procedure the Charter can be amended in the future. However, the Group has considered that this question goes beyond its mandate since it will have to be examined by the Plenary as part of the general question of amendment procedure(s) for the various building blocks of the future Treaty framework.

B. On accession to the European Convention on Human Rights

I. General conclusions and recommendations

Just as in the case of the Charter, the Group stresses at the outset that, in accordance with the Group's mandate, the final political decision about the perspective of possible accession by the Union (i.e. by the new single legal personality as emerging from the work of Working Group III) to the ECHR will be reserved to the Convention Plenary. The mandate of the Group has been to prepare such a decision through examination of a number of specific questions relating to modalities and consequences of possible accession.

The Group furthermore stresses that the Convention is to decide only on whether to introduce into the new Treaty a constitutional authorisation enabling the Union to accede to the ECHR. In contrast, it would later be for the institutions of the Union, notably for the Council deciding by unanimity, to open negotiations for an accession treaty and set the concrete framework of those negotiations; during such negotiations, a range of technical questions regarding the concrete modalities of accession, of which the Group has taken due note<sup>1</sup>, will have to be dealt with. Likewise, the decision on the appropriate timing for possible accession by the Union to the ECHR and to its various additional protocols should be left for the Council. All these questions are not of a constitutional nature and therefore not for the Convention.

Without prejudice to the final political decision by the Plenary, and on the basis of the arguments and conclusions set out below, all members of the Group either strongly support or are ready to give favourable consideration to the creation of a constitutional authorisation enabling the Union to accede to the ECHR.

The main political and legal arguments speaking in favour of accession by the Union to the ECHR, which have been recognised by the Group, are the following:

- Accession to the ECHR would give citizens the same degree of protection vis-à-vis acts of the Union as they presently enjoy vis-à-vis all the Member States. This appears to be a question of credibility, given that Member States have transferred substantial competences to the Union and that adherence to the ECHR has been made a condition for membership of new States in the Union.

---

<sup>1</sup> See notably WD N° 8, containing a study carried out within the Council of Europe on technical and legal questions of possible accession to the ECHR.

- Accession would be the ideal tool to ensure a harmonious development of the case law of the two European Courts in human rights matters; for some, this argument has even greater force in view of a possible incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties. In this connection, mention should also be made of the problems resulting from the present non-participation of the Union in the Strasbourg judicial system in cases where the Strasbourg Court is led to rule indirectly on Union law without the Union being able to defend itself before that Court or to have a judge in the Court who would ensure the necessary expertise on Union law.
- As the Union reaffirms its own values through its Charter, its accession to the ECHR would give a strong political signal for the coherence between the Union and the "greater Europe", comprised in the Council of Europe and its pan-European human rights system.

The Group has looked in depth into the possible impact of accession to the ECHR on the principle of autonomy of Community (or Union) law including the position and authority of the European Court of Justice. It has emerged from the Group's discussion and expert hearings<sup>1</sup> that the principle of autonomy does not place any legal obstacle to accession by the Union to the ECHR. After accession, the Court of Justice would remain the sole supreme arbiter of questions of Union law and of the validity of Union acts; the European Court on Human Rights could not be regarded as a superior Court but rather as a specialised court exercising external control over the international law obligations of the Union resulting from accession to the ECHR. The position of the Court of Justice would be analogous to that of national constitutional or supreme courts in relation to the Strasbourg Court at present.

The Group stresses that the incorporation of the Charter into the Treaties and the Union's accession to the ECHR should not be regarded as alternatives, but rather as complementary steps ensuring full respect of fundamental rights by the Union: just as the existence of the Charter does not in any way diminish the benefits of extending the control of the Strasbourg Court to cover Union acts, so accession to the ECHR does not reduce the significance of the Union's own catalogue of fundamental rights. The two steps would lead to a situation analogous to that in the laws of the Member States whose Constitutions protect fundamental rights but who at the same time have subscribed to the additional external human rights check by the Strasbourg system.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. the concurring statements by Judges Skouris (WD N° 19) and Fischbach (CONV 295/02) as well as by Messrs. Schoo, Piris and Petite (WD N° 13).

In the light of the above, the Group therefore recommends that, if the Plenary agrees politically on the idea of accession, a legal basis should be inserted at an appropriate place in the Constitutional Treaty which would authorise the Union to accede to the ECHR. The drafting of such a legal basis could be kept very simple<sup>1</sup>. Given the constitutional significance of possible accession, it should however also be specified that the signature and conclusion of the accession treaty require a decision by the Council by unanimity and the assent of the European Parliament; otherwise, the normal procedures for international agreements would apply.

II. Conclusions and recommendations with respect to specific questions linked to possible accession by the Union to the ECHR

1. Accession to the ECHR will not modify the division of competences between the Union and the Member States

The Group agrees on the central importance of the fact that accession by the Union to the ECHR - like incorporation of the Charter - will in no way modify the allocation of competences between the Union and the Member States. According to the Group's common understanding, the legal "scope" of the Union's accession to the ECHR would be limited to issues in respect of which the Union has competence; it would thus not lead to any extension of the Union's competences, let alone to the establishment of a general competence of the Union on fundamental rights<sup>2</sup>. Accordingly, "positive" obligations of the Union to take action to comply with the ECHR would arise only to the extent to which competences of the Union permitting such action exist under the Treaty.

The Group recommends the use of certain technical devices in order to clarify with certainty that the Union's accession to the ECHR does not modify the allocation of competences. Firstly, a provision clarifying this point could be included in the possible legal basis authorising accession. Secondly, upon accession, a statement stressing the Union's limited competences in the area of fundamental rights could be included in a provision in the accession treaty and / or in an accompanying declaration made by the Union. Thirdly, a mechanism allowing the Union and a Member State to appear jointly as "co-defendants" before the Strasbourg Court could ensure that

<sup>1</sup> The legal base could for example state that the Union shall be authorised to accede to the ECHR.

<sup>2</sup> Existing preparatory work for accession has also proceeded upon this understanding, see the Council of Europe's study, WD N° 8, at para. 26, an understanding confirmed by Judges Skouris and Fischbach (WD N° 19; CONV 295/02) and by Mr. Petite (WD N° 13) at the respective hearings.

that Court would not make any ruling on the allocation of competences between the Union and the Member States in cases of doubt<sup>1</sup>.

In this context, it is important to bear in mind that accession by the Union to the ECHR would not mean that the Union would become a member of the Council of Europe, nor that it would become a general political player in Strasbourg. Rather, the Union and its law would simply take part (with a "scope" limited to its competences) in the specific system of judicial human rights control established by the ECHR. Concretely, there would be a judge at the Strasbourg Court elected "with respect to" ("à titre de") the Union, who would contribute specific expertise in Union law to the Court. Furthermore, a representative of the Union would take part in the Committee of Ministers' specific task of supervising execution of judgments under Article 46 ECHR (which is important notably to ensure that the Committee is properly informed on questions of Union law such as on the system of competences), but not in the Committee's general functions outside of the ECHR.<sup>2</sup>

2. The Member States' individual positions with respect to the ECHR will be unaffected by the Union's accession

The Group underlines the importance of the principle that accession by the Union to the ECHR does not affect the positions which the Member States have taken individually with respect to the ECHR, as reflected in particular in their individual decisions on the ratification of certain additional protocols, in the reservations they have entered upon ratification of the ECHR or its additional protocols, and in their right to take derogatory measures. The Group stresses that this point can be fully taken into account, since:

- As explained above, the Convention now has to discuss the insertion in the Treaty of a legal basis permitting accession by the Union to the ECHR. If such a possible legal basis were inserted, it would then be for the Council to define, by unanimity, to which additional protocols the Union should accede and when, and which reservations the Union should enter in respect of the ECHR in its own name.
- The Member States' individual reservations made in respect of the ECHR and additional protocols, as well as their right to take derogatory measures (Article 15 ECHR), would in any event remain unaffected by accession since they concern the respective national law, whereas accession by the Union would have legal effect only insofar as Union law is concerned.

<sup>1</sup> The mechanism has been explained to the Group by Judge Fischbach, see summary note CONV 295/02, p. 5, and is also explained in detail in the Council of Europe's study, Working Document n° 8, at paras 57 - 62.

<sup>2</sup> This statement is without prejudice to presently existing arrangement of participation in the meetings of the Committee of Ministers by the Community without a right to vote, see WD N° 8, at para. 34.

III. Conclusions with respect to alternative mechanisms proposed to accession to the ECHR

In the light of expert testimony<sup>1</sup> given to the group on the legal and practical problems with several mechanisms sometimes suggested as alternatives to accession by the Union to the ECHR, such alternative mechanisms (e.g., a special procedure of "referral" or "consultation" from the Court of Justice to the Strasbourg Court, a special recourse to the Strasbourg Court against the institutions without accession, or a "joint panel/chamber" composed of judges from both European Courts), are not recommended by the Group.

B. Access to the Court of Justice

The Group discussed the Union's current system of remedies available to individuals, notably in the light of the fundamental right to effective judicial protection.

In this context, the Group has examined the idea of establishing a special procedure before the Court of Justice for the protection of fundamental rights. As a majority of members had reservations about this idea, the Group does not recommend it to the Convention. The Group underlines however the great benefit which citizens would gain from a possible incorporation of the Charter into the Constitutional Treaty architecture, thereby making the Union's present system of remedies available for the defence of their Charter rights.

The Group wishes however to draw the Plenary's attention to a different issue, namely the question whether or not the conditions of direct access by individuals to the Court (Article 230 § 4 TEC) need reforming in the interest of ensuring effective judicial protection. On this point, the Group's discussion has shown that a certain lacuna of protection might exist, given the current condition of "individual concern" in Article 230 § 4 TEC and the case law interpreting it, in the specific case of "self-executing" Community regulations which impose directly applicable prohibitions on individuals. On the other hand, a widely shared trend emerged in the group's discussion according to which the present overall system of remedies, and the "division of work" between Community and national courts it entails, should not be profoundly altered by a possible reform of Article 230 § 4 TEC. Some members have referred to the possibility of a provision in the Treaty on the obligation of Member States, as spelt out in recent case law<sup>1</sup>, to provide for effective remedies for rights derived from Union law.

In any event, while the issue of Article 230 § 4 TEC certainly has a nexus with fundamental rights, it transcends the protection of those rights - as judicial protection must exist for all subjective rights -, and it arises quite independently of the concrete questions of the incorporation of the Charter and accession to the ECHR. The Group considers that this issue and its institutional implications must be examined together with other topics such as the limits of Court jurisdiction in Justice and Home affairs<sup>2</sup> or judicial control of subsidiarity. The Group therefore refrains from making concrete recommendations and commends the question of possible reform in Article 230 § 4 TEC, together with the valuable contributions submitted thereon<sup>3</sup>, for further examination by the Convention in an appropriate context.

<sup>2</sup> In this connection, attention is drawn to expert testimony given to the Group reflecting concerns, from a perspective of protection of fundamental rights, about these limits as presently contained in Article 68 TEC and Article 35 TEU in an area as sensitive to fundamental rights as Justice and Home affairs; see the hearing of Judge Skouris (WD N° 19) and of Mr. Schoo of 23 July 2002 (WD N° 13), as well as WD N° 20 of Mr. Ben Fayot presenting a note by Advocate-General Francis Jacobs.

The European Convention
Working Group on “Incorporation of the Charter/Accession to the ECHR”

Modalities and consequences of incorporation into the Treaties of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and accession of the Community/ Union to the ECHR

Subject: Incorporation of the Charter

1. Techniques of incorporation

Although the working group has limited its approach to the examination of the technical aspects of incorporation, the choice between different forms of incorporation representing different degrees of acknowledgement of its legal value involves the substantial question of the legal status of the Charter in the future.

Only some of the methods of incorporation ensure that the Charter acquire the status of a legally binding text. A binding force has beneficial effects as regards justiciability, and would ensure consistency between the different human rights standards across the three pillars of the Union. Therefore, I consider, that the options ensuring a binding force are preferable.

Furthermore, a treaty of a constitutional character containing a list of fundamental rights would constitute a move for the Community towards conceiving itself as a constitutional unit thus, the incorporation may convey a stronger political message. The coherent list of fundamental rights having legally binding force would raise people’s awareness of their rights.

2. The question of “replication” in the Charter

The necessary elimination of the replications created by the incorporation of the Charter raises the question of whether the articles of the Charter or those of the current Treaty should be deleted. As far as I see, both general provisions of fundamental rights having broader scope and those relating to specific chapters and sectors are to be maintained given the complementary character of more detailed provisions.

3. Treaty provisions concerning the Court of Justice

a) Amendment of Article 46(d)

Article 46(d) of the TEU conflicting with Article 51(1) of the Charter codifying the well established case law of the Court of Justice is to be deleted in order to ensure legal certainty.

b) Competences of the Court in the field of justice and home affairs

The Treaty of Amsterdam has significantly extended the role of the Court of Justice in the 3rd Pillar. Nevertheless, the jurisdictional competence remained restricted and the preliminary ruling procedure has been modified to the detriment of the citizens. Given that the prevalence of the fundamental rights in the field of the 3rd Pillar is particularly important and the availability of the Court of Justice is essential in guaranteeing the respect those rights, we agree with further extension of the competence of the Court and the proposed modification in the wording of the provision limiting the use of the preliminary ruling procedure.

c) The question of liberalizing the conditions for direct action before the Court

Ensuring binding force to the Charter brings about the need to ensure that individuals have direct access to the European Court in order to challenge Community acts violating their fundamental rights. The introduction of the direct recourse procedure is essential in assuring full protection and transparency among others.

Subject: Accession of the Community/Union to the ECHR

The accession of the Community/Union to the ECHR would put in place an effective external control mechanism of the legislative and enforcement activity of the Community institutions providing for a possibility of direct access of individuals to an independent court ensuring full protection of human rights. Therefore, I am in favour of an eventual accession.

Despite the fact that the consultation mechanism proposed in the working paper could be useful in order to eliminate the problems arising from the possible lack of coherence in the interpretation of human rights of the two courts, I am not convinced by the necessity of its introduction. The purpose of the establishment of the consultation mechanism in the European legal order has been related to the specific character of the Community judicial system; hence this mechanism is not essential in the ECJ – European Court relation.

The main concerns of the opponents of accession to the ECHR relate to the autonomy of Community law and the subordination of the Luxemburg Court. In my opinion, the autonomy of the Community law is not affected by the accession, given that the Strasbourg Court has no competence in the interpretation of Community law nor in the annulment of Community legal acts. According to my views, the subsidiary competence of the Strasbourg Court is manifested by the fact, that the Court respects a certain degree of discretionary power of the national authorities.

Subject: Rights of minorities with special regard to those of national minorities

Being aware of the fact, that the completion of the protected fundamental rights of the Charter will be effectuated by a political decision to be made eventually by the plenary session of the Convention, the contradiction between the practice of the EU enforcing the protection of minority rights in the accession candidate countries by the Copenhagen-criteria, Europe Agreements and the recommendations made in the framework of the Accession Partnership and the lack of legal basis in this field for the adoption of the same kind of measures in the Community necessitates urgent action. Furthermore, I would like to draw the attention to the fact, that the Europe Agreements remaining in force after the first round of enlargement will maintain this controversial “double standard” situation despite the fact that the Charter provides for the non-discrimination of persons on the grounds of their membership in a national minority.

Comments on the draft final report of working group II (doc. no. 25)

Dear Mr Vitorino,

I wish to thank you for the excellent draft final report which describes, in a very balanced manner, the gist of our discussions and the support expressed by members of the group both for an incorporation of the Charter of fundamental rights and for the accession of the European Union to the European Convention of Human Rights.

I only have a few comments to make. They are as follows:

1. There is a marked difference in how the draft report refers to the topic of incorporation and to the topic of accession. In order to avoid this difference I propose to add a sentence in A.I.1 on page 3 at the end of paragraph 2 (following the words: "... ensuring legal certainty"):

"Furthermore, the aforementioned common understanding is to be seen in conjunction with the corresponding unity on the issue of accession by the European Union to the European Convention on Human Rights, cf. point B I, 3rd paragraph below".

2. It has been my impression that working groups should refrain from submitting detailed drafting proposals. This is why I would suggest a slight change of the text now in A.II.1, the second paragraph of page 5 where we should delete any reference to "drafting adjustments" and instead let the two first sentences read:

"Accordingly ..... and appropriate as explained below and as set out in the Annex to this report".

3. Under A, II, 3 I wish to propose, in the third paragraph on page 7, ("dédouplements") the following wording (bold): "Furthermore, the Group is of the view that, as regards these rights, a certain "replication" ("dédouplements") between the Charter and other parts of Treaty law might be inevitable for legal reasons and should be minimised."

4. In Chapter B,I, second paragraph on page 12 the report rightly mentions that the Group has discussed the necessary constitutional authorisation enabling the Union to accede to the ECHR. The same paragraph ends with a sentence stating that questions which are "not of a constitutional nature are not for the Convention". In my opinion, the Convention is competent to discuss a great variety of issues and not at all limited to constitutional matters, as is clear from debates in and recommendations of other working groups.

I therefore propose to delete the last sentence of paragraph 2 as inaccurate and to replace it with the following text:

"However, nothing prevents the Heads of State and Government to commit themselves politically to an accession by the European Union to the European Convention of Human Rights, for instance in the Final Act of the Intergovernmental Conference which is to be convened following the Convention."

5. Still on Chapter B, I, paragraph 4 (pages 12-13) there is an enumeration of reasons in favour of accession. Much more could be said in this context but if no other change is made I would at least ask that what is now the third indent ("greater Europe" argument) be placed first.

6. There is another difference of expression pertaining to what the group sees fit to recommend regarding on the one hand the incorporation (A.I.2 paragraph 1 on pages 3-4, options "a and b") and on the other the accession (B.I. paragraph 7 on page 14). In the first context, the Group straightforwardly recommends the Plenary to consider two options whereas in the latter the Group's recommendation is not only conditioned by a later Plenary decision but also less well presented.

This is why I first propose to delete the words "if the Plenary agrees politically on the idea of accession" since the group must have the full right to make proposals regardless of subsequent decisions of the Plenary and also since all who have spoken in our group have been in favour of an accession.

I then propose that the presentation follows the one in A.I.2 on pages 3-4 so that the first sentence of the paragraph will appear as follows:

"In the light of the above, the Group therefore recommends -----:

- that a legal basis should be inserted at an appropriate place in the Constitutional Treaty which would authorise the Union to accede to the ECHR."

7. Regarding B.II.1 on page 15 I propose to delete the last four words of the first paragraph ""in cases of doubt") which seem ambiguous in the context.

8. Regarding B.III on page 16 I am very much attached to your writing concerning "alternative mechanisms" especially since concerted legal opinions have ruled them out.

Finally, I assume that the last part of the report concerning Access to the ECJ should be labeled "C".

Yours sincerely,

Ingvar

GRUPE DE TRAVAIL II / DOCUMENT DE TRAVAIL 25 du 14 octobre 2002

INCORPORATION DE LA CHARTE DES DROITS FONDAMENTAUX - ACCESSION DE L'UE A LA CEDH

Impression générale: Il faut reconnaître que le projet de rapport constitue un effort important pour rendre fidèlement les détails et l'accord obtenu. Cependant, il ne cesse de mettre en avant une prudence extrême, voire une grande méfiance à l'encontre de la Charte des Droits fondamentaux, comme si celle-ci était une machine de guerre diabolique pour élargir subrepticement les compétences de l'Union au détriment des compétences des Etats membres. Or, il faut rappeler que la Charte a fait l'objet d'un large consensus lors de la 1ère Convention et qu'elle a fait l'objet d'une déclaration solennelle du Conseil européen de Nice. Surtout, elle a rencontré un accueil très favorable dans un grand nombre d'Etats membres et surtout auprès des opinions publiques et de la société civile. Tout en reconnaissant les limites de ce document, il faut convenir que c'est le premier document lisible et visible où les citoyens européens trouvent rassemblés leurs droits.

Etant donné la prudence et la méfiance dont question plus haut, le noyau central du rapport donne l'impression de se concentrer sur une limitation encore plus prononcée que dans le documents original des droits y contenus.

A. On the Charter

I. Recommendations as to the form of possible incorporation of the Charter

1. General recommendation

Le rapport parle (p. 3 version anglaise) du "common understanding" sur certains aspects légaux et techniques de la Charte.

Ces aspects concernent sans doute les points suivants:

- les articles horizontaux
- l'importance du préambule
- le statut des commentaires des articles établis par la présidence de la 1ère Convention

Or, si nous étions d'accord sur le rôle important du préambule et sur le statut des commentaires, nous ne l'étions pas sur la nécessité d'ajouter des articles horizontaux.

2. Recommendations as to the concrete form of incorporation

La majorité s'est prononcée pour l'incorporation du texte complet de la Charte dans un traité constitutionnel pour des raisons de lisibilité de ce traité.

II. Conclusions and recommendations on certain legal and technical aspects...

1. Le groupe de travail n'a pas reconnu la nécessité d'adaptations aux articles horizontaux. Les propositions de nouvelles formulations aux articles horizontaux n'ajoutent rien quant à la sécurité juridique et donnent au contraire l'impression de vouloir à tout prix limiter voire annuler la portée de la Charte des droits fondamentaux.

2. C'est pourquoi je ne peux donner mon accord à l'alinéa 2 de ce paragraphe 2 où il est dit: "...the Group recommends the drafting adjustments to Art. 52.1 and 2."

Il ne me semble pas nécessaire d'ajouter dans 52.6 une référence à la subsidiarité, déjà indiquée dans le Préambule.

III. Recommendations concerning further questions arising in the context of possible incorporation

1. Preamble of the Charter

Je suis sceptique quant à la formulation : "the Charter Preamble...enriched by further elements as appropriate" au cas où le préambule deviendrait celui du traité constitutionnel. Pour ma part, je suis d'avis qu'il convient d'intégrer toute la Charte et éviter d'y toucher.

3. The importance of the "Explanations"

On propose d'ajouter les commentaires de ce rapport sur les adaptations des articles horizontaux aux commentaires de la Charte.

Or, ceux-ci étaient les commentaires du Présidium et étaient purement explicatifs. Je ne pense pas qu'on puisse imposer maintenant, par le biais de ce rapport, des interprétations à ces explications

C. Access to the Court of Justice

Quant à la nécessité d'étendre la protection juridique, il convient d'ajouter, outre les règlements européens directement exécutoires, les mesures prises dans le cadre du 3e pilier et des agences comme Europol qui touchent aux droits et libertés des individus et ne rentrent pas nécessairement dans le champ d'action des tribunaux nationaux.

Voilà quelques rapides remarques lors d'une première lecture. Je regrette que le délai qui nous est donné pour examiner le rapport du président soit extrêmement court.

Re: Comment on the Draft Final report WD 25

Dear Mr Vitorino,

It is with great satisfaction that I have read the draft final report. I want to compliment you on the way you succeeded in this difficult task.

However, I want to put forward one point of great importance.

In your report you have left the decision on the incorporation in the (Constitutional) Treaty or in a Protocol attached to it, to the Convention Plenary.

Yet I want to stress the importance of a clear choice of this Working Group as regards the modalities of the incorporation of the Charter.

The EU grows from a economic and political Union to a Union of values. The heart and soul of this Union of values is the Charter. It is, in your words, the ‘building block’.

But how can we stress the importance of a Union of values, without taking on board the Charter in the Treaty itself?

I am convinced that the Charter belongs in the (Constitutional) Treaty itself, even regarding the equally legally binding nature of a Protocol. In my impression this opinion was shared by all members of the group.

For this reason I strongly plead for an explicit choice in this final report in favour of the full incorporation of the Charter in the Treaty itself.

With Kind Regards,
